"I might have realized that. Of course you would."

"Could we ask Mrs. Angus today, please?"

"I don't see why not."

It was late in the afternoon before they saw a sign of Mrs. Angus. They had finished their schoolwork and were listening to a big band of soldiers marching with loud music on the television set, making such a noise that they did not even hear Mrs. Angus coming into the room.

"I'm sure you'll forgive me, Mr. Wade," she said, and turned the little knob that made the band quieter. "I've rather a headache."

"But of course, Mrs. Angus. Sorry we were making such a racket." He turned the knob and the band disappeared altogether.

Mrs. Angus walked over to a small table with a glass bottle on it. "I thought you'd have left by now, Mr. Wade," she said. "Won't you have a glass of sherry?"

"Thanks. I was waiting to have a word with you about another little plan I've been thinking about, Mrs. Angus."

Mrs. Angus smiled. "What is it this time?"

She handed him the small glass of sherry and poured one for herself. Then she came and sat down, and Mr. Wade sat facing her.

"I'm so sorry," Mr. Wade began, "that you weren't well enough yesterday to go sightseeing with Jonny. I'm wondering if I might steal one of those particular 'sights' off your list and take him there myself."

"Yes?"

"I thought it might interest him to go round the U.N. Building."

"Isn't he a little young to understand these things?"

Mr. Wade gave her a friendly smile. "Oh, I don't deny there's a great deal about the U.N. that would be lost on him. But he'd learn more about it as he grew older. In any case, it would give him a chance to see some other children of his own age."

"What other children?"

"They have a system of guides at the U.N. School parties usually arrive there in buses. The junior grades get together on these things. I thought that if Jonny were to share a little adventure like that ——"

"Can't you take him alone? I'm sure other children go sight-seeing there with just an adult."

"Indeed they do. But his need is to be with other children. A trip like this is just the thing I'd choose for him."

"You would choose."

Mr. Wade set down his glass on the edge of the table. "Yes, Mrs. Angus. It's the sort of thing I would choose."

"I see. I thought we'd been through all this before."

"You'll remember saying that if any other ideas of this kind occurred to me ——"

"I know I did. But I have some very clear ideas on what's good and what is not good for a boy like Jonathan."

"Have you stopped to consider that you could possibly be a little too definite about all this?"

"What do you mean?"

"I mean that it can be very dangerous to be too rigid where a little boy like Jonny is concerned . . . or with any other small boy who's not in any position to speak for himself."

Mrs. Angus sat curiously still. "There's no need for you to be insulting, Mr. Wade," she said.

"An honest opinion is hardly an insult. If you don't do something quickly about Jonathan you're going to cause lasting damage. Shutting him up in this house and blocking any normal contact with the world ——"

Mrs. Angus rose to her feet. "I won't listen to this!" she said.

Mr. Wade also stood up. "I think you'll realize that it could be useful to listen to me, Mrs. Angus. Can't you be honest enough to face the facts?"

"What facts?"

Mr. Wade stood perfectly still and l at her. "I think the main one is that you really care about Jonathan's finding a h don't believe his need meant a thing to yo you wanted was to get back the status qu get even with life for having robbed y your other son!"

"You wouldn't dare to say these thi Mr. Angus ——"

"I sincerely think he'd understand, whether he would or not, somebody's g speak up for Jonny while there's still Other people have tried to revenge them on God, Mrs. Angus—but I've seldom s more heartless way of trying it."

Mrs. Angus stood in silence for a mo Then she gave a sharp, strange little cry did not look at Mr. Wade again. She walked to the door in a quick, stiff kind of

When she had gone, the room was fr silence. While Jonathan watched, Mr. W shoulders drooped, but he suddenly s himself, and came quickly over the carpe put a hand on Jonathan's shoulder.

"It isn't the first time I've talked n out of a job, Jonny—but it had to be d won't be coming back here."

Jonathan closed his eyes very tightly clung to Mr. Wade in a kind of shar loneliness. "Please take me, too, Mr. W

"Can't be done, Jonny. I'd give a lo could take you, but soon your father back again. Everything will be all right won't it?"

Jonathan nodded. He did not say any

Mr. Wade patted him gently on the s der, and then went out of the room. Jon heard him go down the hall to the front

He ran to the window and looked ou the street. It was dark out there now, a could see, in the y patch of light near the lamp, that it was ra He supposed that Mr. was one of the sha hurrying away over shiny pavement.

He turned round to at the room again. The were on, but it looke and dark and stra lonely.

Perhaps it would be to play the piano. The piano was the one in the room that looked friendly and inv He climbed onto the piano stool. He p hands down over the cool, clean keys, started to play.

What he played he did not know, but of the sounds were big and comforting tried to find them again, but although he quite near to them, he did not find them

Suddenly he made a big, grand new so And because it was exciting and differe played it again, and then again.

He did not know how often he playe sound. He became lost in the bigness an noise of it. But in the middle of it some made him look quickly around and there Mrs. Angus, coming through the door.

There was a long, flowing, filmy black that came billowing and sweeping after She almost ran toward him, and there something terrible about the way she ran.

"Didn't you hear me say I had a h ache?" She did not say the words. She sho She swept his hands off the keys with her hard hands—and suddenly, as he shrank from her, she slammed down the lid o piano. The noise was like a gun. It was just like the sound of a gun. It was the so

He pressed his hands over his ears ducked his head. Out of the corners of his he could see Mrs. Angus staring at him. T he saw her turn sharply and run quickly o the room.

But the noise of the gun went on. Scre were with it now, and the voice of Sala, the voice of his mother.

"Jonny!" they called. "Jonny! C quick, Jonny—hurry . . . hurry, Jonny!"

He stood up and clutched the edge o piano. There was nobody behind him, any moment there would be somebody th

He ran over the thick carpet and out o door into the hall. He struggled with the

CONTINUED ON PAGE 125

No one is fool enough to choose war instead of peace. For in peace sons bury fathers, but in war fathers bury sons.

HERODOTUS

Perfect gift for Mother's Day, May 11

WEST BEND®

One heat control serves all automatically automatic heat control $5.95

Completely immersible

Cook 'n Serve appliances

West Bend's Automatic Heat Control appliances offer the beauty of gold 'n black accents — and the cooking magic of "balanced," even heat. You need only a single control. It operates Skillet, Sauce Pan or Griddle — so you save $5.95 whenever you purchase an additional Cook 'n Serve appliance. They're all completely immersible, too. Skillet with polished aluminum cover (illustrated) is 11″ x 11″, holds 3¾ quarts. Roasts, fries, pan broils, bakes, simmer-serves. Sculptured "gunstock" handle, all 'round pouring lip and cooking guide. $16.95 (with control, $22.95*). Skillet with gold color cover $17.45*; including control $23.45*.

automatic 3 qt. sauce pan

Talk about easy! Controlled-heat cooking is like a dream with this 3 qt. covered sauce pan that eliminates "pot watching" forever. Soups, casseroles, sauces, candies —all respond with delicious perfection. The secret is amazing "balanced" heat. Perfect corn popper, too. $12.95 (with heat control, $18.95*). Trivet included.

automatic griddle 'n server

Now the hostess enjoys the party, too. New Griddle 'n Server offers more than 200 sq. inches of cooking area for a colorful party "spread," serving a complete piping-hot meal or preparing all the delicious hamburgers or pancakes you need. Holds 10 full-size slices of French toast. $21.95 (with heat control, $27.95*).

Other West Bend suggestions for Mother's Day, Anniversaries, Weddings, Birthdays and other gift occasions . . .

*includes excise tax at leading housewares, hardware, gift and appliance stores; prices slightly higher in Canada and Hawaii

BUFFET-PATIO SERVER
$6.95*

Stainless Steel
With Copper Bottom
TRIG TEA KETTLE $4.95

Stainless Steel
4 qt. ICE BUTLER
$12.95

24-carat Gold-plated
6-8 cup FLAVO-MATIC
$24.95*

12-24 cup
AUTOMATIC "PERK" $29.95
50 cup, $39.95 72 cup, $42.95

WEST BEND ALUMINUM CO., Dept. 675, West Bend, Wisconsin

Amana air conditioning means a cleaner, happier, more restful home! Less drudgery for you, so much more comfort!

More time for children and living when you have food security with an Amana Freezer or Freezer-Plus-Refrigerator!

Cooking is more fun! Endless variety and practically no preparation time, with modern frozen foods, the Amana way!

Time for church work, bridge, P.T.A., pleasure when you have meals ready, your Amana, whenever you get home!

Expert Homemakers Insist On Amana®

Famous for Quality

Yes, busy American women have long since learned how Amana products help them enjoy happier, healthier, thriftier lives!

The World-Renowned Amana Freezer! First upright freezer to gain popular fame . . . first freezer to carry the famous Amana Double-Warranty! 1. Five-Year Warranty on all mechanical refrigeration components. 2. Five-Year Warranty against food spoilage due to mechanical failure of refrigeration system. Only Freezer with the fabulous Stor-Mor Door, holds a month of meals alone. Only Freezer with Amana-Matic freezing, 2½ times faster! 6 fast freezing surfaces! Every shelf, plus top and bottom, a prime even 0° freezing surface!

Stunning New Freezer-Plus-Refrigerator! New Amana Style-Line gives you the smart, modern, Built-In Look, without expensive installation costs. 16 cubic feet of spacious storage room! Full family-size refrigerator, plus a genuine Amana Upright freezer section that holds 263 pounds of frozen food alone . . . at even 0° temperature always. And you get all this convenience and luxury in just 32 inches of wall space! Also available in superb 14 and 18 cubic foot models. See your dealer, present refrigerator more than covers normal down payment!

Finest Room Air Conditioning You Can Buy! Highest-quality Amana refrigeration principles are built into this outstanding air conditioning. Golden-Silent, these high-capacity air conditioners dehumidify, exhaust stale air and, in Year-Round line, thermostatically heat or cool room to exact setting! Prices for every purse, models for every home, capacity for every climate.

Amana®
BACKED BY A CENTURY-OLD TRADITION OF FINE CRAFTSMANSHIP

Remember, you pay no premium for world-famous Amana quality, so see these Amana products at your dealer's soon!
Room Air Conditioners • Central System Air Conditioning • Freezer-Plus-Refrigerator and the world-renowned Stor-Mor Freezer that is . . .

GUARANTEED TO OUTPERFORM ALL OTHERS • AMANA REFRIGERATION, INC. • AMANA 4, IOWA

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 122

knob and turned it. Then, without even g to close the door behind him, he ran and down the steps.

here were some who stopped to stare at as he ran by. He saw their faces—pale and k in the light from the street lamps. He no coat on, and soon the rain was drip- through his hair and under his collar and n his back. He was cold all over.

e did not know where he was, and the dings were high and strange. Crying made rder to see, and he knew that he was lost. e stumbled out of the rain into a doorway. as dark but it was dry in there, and he ed against a brick wall and gasped until ould breathe more slowly again.

e came out of the doorway and went on n the street. His legs were tired now, and id not run any more. He just walked, look- at the lighted windows and the people he d glimpse behind them.

he windows looked different now, and so the people on the street. There was not so h traffic here. There were little shops, with s of vegetables and boxes of other things on the pavement.

hen it was that a kind and comforting g began to happen. He saw something looked like home . . . like real home, not hing to do with the house on Fifth Ave-was some words in Chinese, painted in so that they glittered wetly in the lamp- . What the words , Jonathan was not , but there were also e big words in Eng- Two of the words he d read for himself. y said CHENG LIN. The r word spelled LAUN- .

e ran across the street stared inside. Then he t up to the door. It was tly open. He pushed it e enough to walk ugh.

here was a short, high nter in there, with a gap in it, but there did seem to be anybody either on his side of the nter or on the other. A warm and comfort- smell was around him. It, too, seemed to ng to home. It was a happy smell, like m, wet towels, and ginger, and packets of and it made him think for a moment that would pop her head around the back- m door.

ure enough, a second or two afterward, a did peer out of the back-room door. A arm came round the corner of the wall, a hand flicked on a switch that made the m full of light.

he face and the arm and the hand belonged small woman with a glossy yellow face white hair pushed tightly back from it. as an old face, like Sala's, full of wrinkles. was looking at him through small, bright s that were full of curiosity.

om somewhere long ago the words e to his lips. "Good evening, old lady," he l in Chinese, and the smile on the yellow became a surprised and wondering laugh. You speak Chinese, small boy!" she said he same tongue.

Only a few words," he said in English.

he took an excited little step toward him. was almost as small as he was. "All very !" she said. "Not stay in these wet clothes. o are you?"

or a moment he did not reply. Then he d, "Jonny."

Jonny who?"

f he said "Angus," they might send him k again. His eyes got hot, and the ache e back into his throat.

Who are you?" he asked.

I am Mrs. Lin. Where you come from, ny?"

I ran away."

he old one knelt on the floor and started uttoning the dripping jacket of his suit.

That a bad thing. Perhaps your mother d father look all over for you."

No!" He said it very loudly. "Please don't them come to get me. Don't let them ever come. The soldiers will find me and shoot me—like the other people!"

Mrs. Lin took off the wet coat. She seemed suddenly frightened. "Shoot you? What you telling me? You wait. Tell Mr. Lin about this. He back in a few minutes."

Jonathan slowly shook his head again. He was much too tired to try and stop crying, even if white boys did not cry, and the old lady knew it.

She gripped his hand and led him into the room at the back. It was a plain room, but there was a fire in the hearth, and she led him before it.

"Stand there and get warm," she said, and went through a door and came back almost at once with a dry shirt and some gray trousers. She left them on a chair and went back again—to return with a bowl of hot water that had a sponge and some soap in it. She had a big dry towel over her arm.

Soon all the wet clothes were off, and Mrs. Lin rubbed the soap over the sponge, and sponged him, gently and warmly, all over. Nobody had done that since Sala. Soon he was not crying any more.

It was then that Mr. Lin came home. He was a thin, wrinkled man, and quite an old one too. He was holding a number of coats across his arm. He put them down over the end of the sofa.

"Who this boy?" he asked.

"He came in from the rain," said Mrs. Lin. "He very wet—and also very cold. He ran away from home."

Mr. Lin made clicking noises with his tongue. "Maybe bad trouble for us if they know he's here. We should telephone the police."

There was something in the suggestion that made Jonathan clutch the edge of the towel. "Please!" he begged. "Please let me stay here!"

"He very tired," said Mrs. Lin. "No harm let him stay this night."

Mr. Lin looked anxiously at her, then at Jonathan, then back at Mrs. Lin again. "If father and mother look for him," he said, "then this night very bad for them also."

"Too wet for him to go out again," said Mrs. Lin. "Please let him stay this night."

Mr. Lin looked at his wife. "Well," he said, "it is long after small boy's bedtime. We will talk about what to do in the morning."

Mrs. Lin gave a sigh and a laugh at the same time. She looked down at the shirt she held. "Now we find something to sleep in. Good to be in laundry, Jonny. Always something dry and clean for when you need!"

It was only beginning to be day when he started to wake up, and the first thing he heard was a sound of long ago. It was the sound of quick, high-up Chinese voices. The people seemed to be working as they talked, for there were loud banging sounds, and a noise like the hiss of steam.

It was through the wall on the other side of the room that he first heard Mrs. Lin again. She was talking to somebody and the somebody had a big voice, and was talking English.

"Small boy very tired," said Mrs. Lin. "So tired he still asleep. But my husband very worried about him. He thought best to telephone you soon as he woke this morning."

"Every police station in town's been looking for the boy. The sooner he comes with me the better."

There was a little pause. Mrs. Lin said, in a helpless kind of voice, "He very afraid of going home."

"Why?"

"He not say."

"Then let's go in and find out."

Jonathan slipped out from under the coverlet and stood by the end of the bed. In the opening door he saw the friendly face of Mrs. Lin, and behind it a much bigger face with red cheeks and a cap with a shiny black peak.

When they were in the room, Jonathan knew that the man was a policeman. "Take it

PLEASE GIVE NOW
MS
HopeChest
MULTIPLE SCLEROSIS

Helena Rubinstein promises you lovelier hair...today

Read how the first lady of beauty science solves your hair problems

HELENA RUBINSTEIN has erased "I can't do a thing with it" from the language. With her fabulous new "hair cosmetics" you can solve every—yes, every—hair problem. Your hair can always look as if you had just stepped out of a good hair salon!

1. Wash your hair with color!

Discover Helena Rubinstein's new Color-Tone Shampoos. They wash dirt out as they wash living color in—safe, certified temporary color that lasts until you shampoo again.

Find your shade: BLONDE-TONE SHAMPOO makes blonde hair blonder. BRUNETTE-TONE adds warm depths to dark hair. RED-HEAD SHAMPOO brings out the flame in red hair or would-be red hair. BROWN-GLOW polishes brown hair with red-gold glints. SILVER-TONE gives grey, white or ash blonde hair young shimmer, corrects "yellowing." Just 1.25 for a 3-month supply!

For more intense color and to blend in grey, dip into Helena Rubinstein's COLOR-TINT RINSES—they wash out with the next change-of-mind! Here's how: After your Color-Tone Shampooing, use BLONDE-TINT (Blonde Venus), BRUNETTE-TINT (Dark Amber), RED-HEAD (Copper Leaf), BROWN-GLOW (Tawny Brown) or SILVER-TINT (Corn Silk). 8 capsules, 1.25.

2. Wave a new hair-do!

Spray curls in, dullness out with new CURL-SHEEN HAIR SPRAY. Makes straight hair want to curl. Just spray, set curls, dry. In minutes you've a new hair-do that lasts till your next shampoo. Spray lightly each day to control hair-do and add highlights. Contains dirt-resisting Proteinair.* 1.50.

For the softest permanent, use Helena Rubinstein's 2-SPEED HOME PERMANENT. You can get the perfect permanent for your hair texture. Directions tell clearly which is best for you, pinwave or salon-type. 1.75.

3. Condition dry, problem hair!

Triumph over tangles, dryness. Helena Rubinstein's SILK-SHEEN CREAM RINSE makes every head a dream to manage (children's too!). It's a special blessing for bleached or dyed hair . . . gives new life, softness. 1.25.

If your hair is wiry or so dry the ends split, pat on HEADLINER every morning. Helena Rubinstein's new greaseless treatment keeps hair smooth, shining and controlled. It's a great hair groom for sons and husbands too! Just 1.25.

Available at leading department and drug stores. Or write Helena Rubinstein, 655 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Prices plus tax

SEND FOR FREE BOOKLET

Yours for the asking, an invaluable booklet on Hair Care and Hair Beauty. Contains instructions for new Do-It-Yourself hair styles. Write Helena Rubinstein, Inc., Dept. H, 655 Fifth Ave., New York 22, N. Y. •T. M.

easy, son," said the policeman. "What's your name?"

"Jonny."

"Could it be 'Jonny' for short, and 'Jonathan' when your folks are mad at you?"

Jonathan nodded.

"And what's the rest of your name? Could it be 'Jonathan Angus'?"

Jonathan looked right up at the policeman and nodded. "Yes, sir."

"Where do you live?"

"A house where the park is."

The policeman nodded. "Fifth Avenue?"

Jonathan nodded again. The policeman seemed to know all about him. He supposed he would be taken back there, and that Mrs. Angus would be angrier than ever. He turned and stared helplessly up at Mrs. Lin, and Mrs. Lin appealed to the policeman. "Is there time for me to get him food, please? No matter where he go, he need breakfast."

"O.K.," said the policeman.

Mrs. Lin shuffled off through the door.

"Listen, son—what are you scared of?" asked the policeman.

"Please don't take me back again, sir."

"And why not?"

Jonathan did not know how to explain. But it was terribly important to make the policeman understand. All he said was "Mrs. Angus ——" and looked sharply at the floor.

"You mean your mother?"

He shook his head. "No. Not my mother."

The policeman wrinkled his brow.

"She is my new one," Jonathan explained.

"You mean she adopted you? Where did you come from, son—I mean before you got to New York?"

"Taishun. In China."

"Then how did you get here?"

"Mr. Angus did it."

"Did he bring you over?"

"No, sir. Miss Lunt did. She does a lot about boys like me. She gets homes for them."

"You mean she works at that kind of thing? Do you remember the name of the people she works for?"

He thought hard. He went back in his memory to the low white building in Hong Kong. "A place called I.C.A.," he said.

The policeman wrote some words in the book. Presently he looked at Jonathan solemnly. "You're scared to go home, son?" he asked.

Jonathan stared back for a moment. "Yes, sir," he said.

Thinking of I.C.A. and Hong Kong again, an idea came to him that made him take a step or two toward the policeman. "Please can I go to be with Miss Lunt, sir—until Mr. Angus comes back?"

The policeman put two large hands on Jonathan's shoulders, smiling a big, broad smile. "We know a lot about I.C.A. I'll have to put in a report on this. But there's nothing in the book that says I can't take you home by way of Miss Lunt—if we can find her."

Jonathan felt very grand and important—sitting in the back seat of a police car with the big policeman at his side. There was a driver in front who looked like a policeman too. His name was Sam, and he had very much surprised Jonathan by picking up a small criss-cross thing with a handle on it, and talking to it. When Sam told the voice where they were going, the voice made a few clucking noises and finally said, "O.K. Call me again when you get there."

Even the voice, however, was not so exciting as being on the way to see Miss Lunt again. Miss Lunt had actually seen the place he came from in Hong Kong, so in a way she was almost like a part of home.

When he got out, the policeman took Jonathan in through the door of such a high skyscraper that even by leaning over backward Jonathan could hardly see the top of it.

Inside the policeman took him into an elevator. He had heard about American elevators. This one started to go up so quickly that he wondered for a moment if part of his stomach actually had jumped into his throat. The office of I.C.A. was high up on the forty-seventh floor, and Jonathan had never been so high.

They came to a door that had the letters I.C.A. on it, and a lot of other words. The policeman opened it. There were a lot of girls on the other side of the door—working at desks. One came to the counter and said, "Miss Lunt's waiting for you, officer."

They went across the crowded office and through a door at the end of it.

It was a quiet room, in there, with the sun shining in at the window. And there, getting up from a big shiny desk, was Miss Lunt.

"Well, Jonny!" she said. "How nice of you to come and see me!" Turning to the policeman, she said, "I'm so glad you brought him to me first, officer."

"Sounded like a good idea, ma'am. Perhaps you could answer some questions?" the policeman said.

"Gladly. But I think this youngster has enough on his mind. Would it be all right if he waited in Mrs. Gibbs' room next door? She's out of town, and he can have it to himself."

Miss Lunt walked over and opened a door on the other side of the room. The policeman went across and stared inside. "No chance of him running away again, I suppose?"

"Not unless he bores a hole through the wall."

Miss Lunt put one hand behind Jonathan's shoulder and shepherded him to the door of the other room. "You don't mind waiting a little while, Jonny? Why don't you draw something on this scratch pad? I'll come back for you soon." She went out again, closing the door.

He went round and sat in the swivel chair at the desk, and took his pen out, but he did not immediately start to draw anything. He was too busy wondering if they were making up their minds in there to send him back to Mrs. Angus. He was also wondering what Mrs. Angus was thinking about him, and whether she had written a letter to tell Mr. Angus about it, and what he would think.

He started to draw something on the pad at last, but suddenly felt very sleepy. He wanted to make a kind of star, but he did not really finish it. He just put his head down on his elbow and closed his eyes.

"Wake up, Jonathan!" Miss Lunt's voice came rumbling into the middle of his dream.

He opened his eyes, and there was Miss Lunt, in front of the desk.

"You've been asleep for nearly two hours! The policeman went long ago—and there's nobody here any longer but you and me. I'm going to take you out in a few minutes to get some lunch, but before that I've some news for you."

He rubbed his eyes and sat up as Miss Lunt sank down into a big brown leather chair.

"To begin with," Miss Lunt said cheerfull "you needn't be afraid of going home today

"Isn't the policeman coming back f me?"

"No, dear. After a lot of telephoning it w decided that it might be a nice change for y to come home with me tonight—and stay my apartment."

This was a new and wonderful thing think about. He began to feel excited insid "Forever and ever?" he asked.

She shook her head with a laugh. "I don expect to be there quite that long myself! N Jonny—just for tonight. Perhaps tomorro night too. Your new father's coming bac from South America to look after you!"

His eyes opened with excitement.

"He's very fond of you, Jonathan. They to him about what had happened on the tel phone last night—all the way down in Braz And he canceled all his plans, to catch a plan and fly back. Mr. Angus is arriving tonight too late to wake you up, I'm afraid. But he coming here first thing in the morning."

Jonathan gazed across the desk and rubbe his hands together with a rush of wonde "When Mr. Angus comes," he began, but sa no more than just the four words, and the again, "When Mr. Angus comes ——"

He had slept on something called a studi couch in Miss Lunt's apartment. After breal fast she had brought him back to the I.C.A offices, and now he was sitting in Mrs. Gibb room again, in the leather chair beside h desk.

At least, he had been sitting in it until he h heard Mr. Angus come into Miss Lunt's offi on the other side of the door.

This time the door was not quite close even though Miss Lunt must have thoug she had closed it. It was open just enou for him to hear what was being said in the And for once he wished that he could hear, for what was being said made his fa hot, and filled him with a kind of prickly co fusion.

"I'd no idea how lonely and disturbed h was becoming, Mr. Angus. I never thought f a moment that you wouldn't give Jonny normal life, with other children of his ow age."

"That question of a school has been ver difficult."

"You didn't mention anything about th when you first applied for Jonny. Have yo stopped to think that the I.C.A. can take hi back again?"

"You—you surely couldn't do that to us!

"If we felt it was for his peace and happ ness we certainly could. We wouldn't hes tate."

"Now . . . please, Miss Lunt ——"

CONTINUED ON PAGE 128

"Here's an interesting article on how the average housewife can earn money in her spare time."

Are you ready for it?

The most advanced sterling of our generation

The Diamond Pattern by Reed & Barton

For nearest store or for illustrated booklet on the new Diamond Pattern write Reed & Barton, Dept. J-58, Taunton, Mass.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 126

"There's something I haven't told you, Mr. Angus. Mr. Wade came here to see me. He'd heard Jonny talk about me and felt that I might be someone who'd help in a crisis."

"I see. I've been wondering how you were so—so informed." There was a little pause, then Mr. Angus went on again. "I don't blame Wade. I'd have done the same thing."

"Then why didn't you? If you were worried, why didn't you tell me how things were before you went away? At least I might have called to see Jonny now and then."

"You don't understand Vivien."

"It's a little late to say that."

"She's quite ill, Miss Lunt, as I told you on the phone. She had an earlier nervous breakdown just after Robin died—neither of us concealed that from you."

"I'm very sorry about her, Mr. Angus—sincerely I am. But what's worrying me most is what's going to happen to Jonny. Do you honestly think it's good for him to be mixed up in this kind of thing?"

It seemed to take a long, long time for Mr. Angus to answer. "I may have been very blind about all this," he said at length. "I suppose a man can love his wife so much that he can't always see what's going on. In Vivien's case she's been going through a hell of her own making, but if you'd known her in the old days—if you knew what she was really like underneath—then you'd believe, as I do, that it can come out right. Honestly it can!"

"If Jonny goes back with you—if you can persuade him to want to go back—what do you propose to do?"

"For one thing, I'm going to see about a school for him. I'm going to make sure that some other healthy young minds and bodies come within sight and sound of him."

"Can you promise that?"

"I promise it."

Jonathan waited for them to talk again. It was Miss Lunt who spoke. "That's what I'd do for him myself, Mr. Angus. He needs loving and understanding. He responds to the smallest thing that anybody does for him. But . . . I believe you've begun to see that for yourself, haven't you? Let's not keep him waiting in there any longer."

Jonathan ran back to the big chair—but he did not quite reach it before they came in.

Mr. Angus looked brown and big and friendly, and there was a wonderful smile on his face. He came right over and put his hands on Jonathan's shoulders.

"It's good to see you again, Jonny."

"Yes, sir."

"You—you really started something, didn't you?"

Jonathan stared for a moment, then he looked away, and fixed his eyes on the opposite wall.

"We've got a lot to talk about. What I'd like is for us to go home and get away from everybody and relax, eh?"

Jonathan turned and faced him, his eyes quite wide and anxious.

"There'll only be the two of us, Jonny. Just you and me. How about it?"

Jonathan went on staring. A hundred questions chased one another through his head, but as he looked at Mr. Angus everything felt suddenly safe again.

"Yes, please," he said.

There was a big fire, bright and crackling, in the music room, even though it was still only morning. With Mr. Angus sitting in the chair opposite, it wasn't really very frightening to be home again—even if the questions about Mrs. Angus remained unanswered.

"Know something?" Mr. Angus said.

Jonathan looked up expectantly.

"Families are for sticking together when there's trouble, Jonny—not for running away from."

Jonathan pondered the words. "I'm sorry if I made you come back all the way from South America. I got—I got frightened because ——"

"I know about it," Mr. Angus said quietly. "Your mother tried to tell me what happened. It wasn't very easy for her to talk, because ——"

"Was she very cross with me?"

"Your mother's very ill—in a hospital, Jonny. You see, when people worry very much about something for a long time, and don't do anything about it, they're apt to get more and more upset deep down inside, until . . . well, it sometimes happens that they get what's called a breakdown, and for a little while they're not able to think very clearly, or to do very much for themselves. It was like that with her, Jonny—after she discovered that you'd run away."

Jonathan grew troubled. "Was it . . . because of me?"

"You mustn't blame yourself. She's not been feeling very well for a long time—since long before you came to us. Now she must stay in the hospital until she's well again. She's realized a lot of things since you last saw her. She wants to think that when she's better, she'll find you at home, and discover that we can be a family again."

"If she wants me, sir, why did she ——"

"Somebody who's having a bad dream sometimes does strange things in it. That's really what she was doing—having a bad dream. Between us we've got to wake her up out of that dream. If we stick together we can do it. It's certainly something I couldn't tackle alone. It needs you. It needs you being bigger than ever."

"Even bigger than . . . the boy in the picture?"

There was a strange, sharp silence.

"So you've been seeing that, too, Jonny," Mr. Angus said softly. "Seems everybody's known how bad things were getting except me. Even Vivien ——" Again Mr. Angus stopped without finishing his sentence.

Jonathan looked up at him. Although he did not fully comprehend what was being said, there was a kind of peace about the words.

"Your mother and I've been talking about something else this morning. We felt that with this house being so close to the park, we didn't really see why you couldn't have a dog."

"Could I? Could I really?"

"Other people around here have them."

"I'd like a fierce dog," said Jonathan. "I'd like a dog that can make the rest of them creep about on their stomachs and tremble! But he won't always be like that. Most of the time he'll just be plain happy—because we'll feed him well, won't we?"

"You bet we will."

"And we can call him Bozzy."

"Indeed we can."

"Golly!" said Jonathan excitedly.

As he thought about the dog, he thought about Mrs. Angus again. "Do you think I could go there, too, please?"

"Where?"

"To the hospital."

Mr. Angus hesitated. "Soon," he said. "Not just yet, Jonny. I'll tell her you'd like to come."

Jonathan nodded. He realized as he did so that he really did want to go. He wanted more than anything to show that he would get busy with Mr. Angus at helping the answers to come out right at last. He stood up and put his hand in his pocket and pulled out the small leather bag. Then he opened it and rolled the ruby out of it.

"Perhaps she would like me to send her this?" he said. "I would like her to have it."

Mr. Angus stood up also, but as he stretched out his hand for the ruby he suddenly turned sharply and looked hard into the fire.

"Thank you, Jonny. Maybe pretty soon she will be able to say thank you also."

Jonathan smiled. He was glad to see Mr. Angus slip the ruby back into the bag and put it into his pocket.

"There's something your mother asked me to do, Jonny. I guess you'd better come along and watch me."

Mr. Angus went across the room to the door, and Jonathan followed. Over the hall they went, and up under the gleaming chandelier to the landing, and to Jonathan's room.

The sun was shining in there now, and everything seemed clean and strangely bright. Mr. Angus went over to the wall above the fireplace. Jonathan saw him put both hands up to the painting of Robin. Then he lifted it down and stood it beside the bed.

And on the wall where the painting had been, there was only the sunlight now; the clear, clean sunlight of the morning.

NEXT MONTH

■ Lou Fabian was not her real name. She had come to the Coastline Club determined to put tragedy behind her, to forget.

But among the guests there was one who knew her secret, who plotted to involve her in terrible danger. Who was this enemy? Lou had to find out quickly . . . before tragedy struck again.

THE FACE OF THE TIGER

By URSULA CURTISS

Complete in the June JOURNAL, condensed from the novel soon to be published by Dodd, Mead & Co.

Now! Quick as 1, 2, 3! VANiSH toilet bowl care!

1. FLIP IT OPEN!

New plastic lid pops off instantly . . . easily!

2. FLOW IT IN!

Bubble-action whisks away stains . . . freshens air!

3. FORGET IT!

Take a breather! Relax!

VANiSH does the work for you.

Bubbling-action beats them all!

Remember! So-called all-purpose cleaners don't do the job here! VANiSH does! It's made to clean toilet bowls. Banish worry, work, mops, mess, odor! It disinfects. Keeps your bathroom fresh as a daisy! It's easy as 1 2 3! Look for VANiSH in the beautiful pink and blue package at your grocer's. Regular or king size.

Cleans toilet bowls as it freshens bathroom air

JUDSON DUNAWAY CORPORATION, DOVER, N. H.

Remember his first great adventure?

With full heart and watchful eyes you helped him enjoy his very first taste of independence.

And how proud you were when he achieved his goal, all by himself, and then, laughing, ran to your waiting arms to share his triumph with you!

Nothing you can give your child is half so precious as this wonderful opportunity to be himself. All through life you want him to be free to choose his way.

That's why it's so important to be on the watch for ideas or ideologies that could set limits to his independence. The idea, for instance, that government should own and run more and more businesses, services, institutions. Don't forget that when government runs more and more things, the individual has less and less freedom and independence!

Think of your son's first "independence day" when you hear talk like that. Point out that in countries where government does control almost everything, the individual is controlled, also. And the loss of anybody's independence is a threat to everybody's freedom.

Very much aware of this danger are the independent electric light and power companies, because government already runs part of the electric business. And powerful people are pressing to take over more.

America's Independent Electric Light and Power Companies*

*Company names on request through this magazine

"Freedom is a woman"

Beautiful Hair

B R E C K

8 ounces $1.00

THERE ARE THREE BRECK SHAMPOO FOR THREE DIFFERENT HAIR CONDITION

The appearance of your hair depends upon the care it receives. Regular use of a Breck Shampo helps bring out the natural loveliness of your hair. There are Three Breck Shampoos. One Bre Shampoo is for dry hair. Another Breck Shampoo is for oily hair. A third Breck Shampoo is f normal hair. The next time you buy a shampoo, select the Breck Shampoo for your own individu hair condition. A Breck Shampoo leaves your hair clean, soft and naturally beautift

The Three Breck Shampoos, available wherever cosmetics are sold, are now marked with color to help you select the correct ty

■ Red for dry hair ■ Yellow for oily hair ■ Blue for normal hair

Enjoy Shirley Temple's Storybook on the NBC Television Network May 8th - Washington Irving's classic story "Rip Van Wink

Copyright 1938 by John H. Breck Inc

She starts private practice this fall, $4000 in debt, with four children to put through college.

Mother is a Doctor now!

Six years ago the Olsens moved to Philadelphia so mother could study medicine.

By NEAL GILKYSON STUART
Photographs By JOSEPH DI PIETRO

Sometime after five o'clock on weekday afternoons at the Olsen house in Northeast Philadelphia, Hugh Olsen, a balding six-footer, head of household and father of four, turns over the issue of whether he shall or shall not peel the potatoes for the family dinner. He does not have to peel them, for he expects his wife, Frances, in at any minute, but he is apt to resolve the question by spreading out some newspapers on the kitchen table and getting to work. He says, with his kind, bespectacled face looking apologetic, "I told Frances I wouldn't cook any more this year—but I wait around and get fidgety, and think I might as well get them done for her."

He is carrying on a husbandly good deed of five years' standing, during which time he and the children saw his wife and their mother enter medical school at the age of thirty-five, graduate four years later from Woman's Medical College in Philadelphia with a cum laude degree, and complete a year of interning at Philadelphia General Hospital. She began this program at a time when her youngest child, Roy, was just entering second grade, when her eight-year-old daughter, Aina Jo, still had pigtails to be braided before school, and her two oldest boys, Toby and Earl, were no more domesticated than most boys of eleven and nine. Furthermore, Hugh's base earnings were $80 a week, and no family money was visible to cover tuition or even housekeeping help.

This year things are easier. Frances is a resident physician at Philadelphia General, in the department of physical medicine and rehabilitation. Her patients are CONTINUED ON PAGE 133

HOW AMERICA LIVES

She decided on one last year of training as a resident physician at Philadelphia General. Also it pays $3400, largely tax-fr

Five extra pairs of hands—her husband's

On her way by 7:30. An hour's drive through traffic. Out of the hospital and home by 5:30. After five years as med student and intern, Fran revels in such "businessman's hours."

Whoever gets home first starts dinner. More often than not that's Hugh, $100-a-week materials writer at Budd Co.

Toby, 17, does family laundry. Pay: $3 a week. He's mechanical whiz, keeps Fran's car in running conditio

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 131 long-term victims of accident or the various crippling diseases such as stroke or polio, there are few emergencies, and she is able to keep almost office-worker hours. She usually drives her '52 car (which Toby, now seventeen, slightingly calls "a hunk of junk") up the steep driveway and into the garage before half past five. As she lets herself in the kitchen door, Hugh's cheerful "Hi, Fran," and a comprehensive look around tell her that all is well.

What meets her eye is a typically cozy scene. Hugh is in his shirt sleeves at the kitchen table, Aina Jo is standing by the stove, stirring something in a double boiler. A delicious smell of chocolate fills the room. In the small, mildly shabby living room, the old-fashioned ten-inch television set is flashing a cartoon, and Roy can be seen hanging over the arm of the couch in an outlandish, twelve-year-old posture.

Aina Jo, on the verge of fourteen, has spectacular, ash-blond hair, and her sweet, grave face lights up at the sight of her mother. Frances sniffs appreciatively and asks, "Have you ever made it before?" Aina Jo laughs and says "No." A cookbook she has brought home from school is propped open on the table. Frances turns to find Roy standing quietly at her elbow. She kisses him on the nose and says "Miss me?" Among the Olsen children, Roy, whose hair is merely yellow, is considered practically a brunet.

The kitchen door opens again, and Earl comes in with a cheerful "Hello, ma." Now fifteen, 6′½″ in his socks, and with hair as white as Aina Jo's, Earl wanders the city streets after school, leading an intense and, to his parents, vaguely alarming social life, but by six o'clock he must be home prepared to submit to tame domestic routine, and he knows it. He grins at his father and settles down with Roy before the TV cartoon, stretching out his long legs. From the cellar below comes the comfortable thrum of the washing machine. That indicates that Toby is down there, putting through one of the three weekly loads of towels, sheets and blue jeans he does for his weekly chore. While the machine works, he is usually at the other end of the cellar doing something complicated with the model motors and transformers he scavenges from every possible source.

With deft motions, Frances puts on a white apron over her dark blue skirt and pulls boxes of frozen vegetables from the refrigerator. The sound of the washing machine in her ears (twelve pairs of blue jeans are getting done) is only one small evidence of a family scheme of things. The already peeled potato in her hand is another. This year Earl is getting up early and cooking and serving breakfast for everyone in the family (he is apt to do it clad only in blue jeans, barefoot and bare-chested). When Aina Jo comes home from school, she washes the breakfast things and makes all the beds. Roy scrubs the bathtub and washbasin. Frances herself will cook the dinner and set the table tonight, as every night, but two of the children will do the serving and clearing, and the other two will do the dishwashing. This, her first year as a doctor, is easier than the five preceding years; for one thing, she can afford to pay the children small wages for their help. But the fine art of family co-operation in the face of necessity still goes on.

Frances Adams Olsen is a brown-haired 5′6″, with a high forehead, well-spaced gray

Earl, the family's 15-year-old rock-'n'-roll fan, is such a keen cook he gets up early to prepare breakfasts for the entire family. Allowance: $3.

nd the children's—enable Frances to complete her training.

Aina Jo, a tomboy till this year, now a grown-up 13, comes straight from school to do beds, breakfast dishes. Pay: $5.

Only 12, Roy's main job is shopping. Working from his parents' list, he picks up the week's food supply every Saturday A.M. His allowance: $2.

After visiting "best friends" in the afternoon, Roy and Aina Jo are ready to stay in and study. Toby'd rather tinker with electric gadgets down cellar. Only Earl says life is blighted by having to stay home.

School nights: No TV after dinner. Everybody studies.

HOW AMERICA LIVES

eyes and a wide, generous mouth. She has an immediate air of self-containment, for she has always been pretty sure of what she wanted to do. She also looks attractively young (she has passed her forty-first birthday), for she is doing what she set out to do with considerable enjoyment.

Frances says, "I don't remember exactly when I decided I was going to be a doctor, but I know when I was a little girl I used to say I was going to be a nurse, and my father, who has always believed in taking things as far as you were capable, would say, 'Why not be a doctor while you're at it?' By the time I was in high school I was taking Latin with medicine in mind."

Frances grew up in Great Kills, Staten Island, New York, the oldest of three daughters in a close family. Her father, who has had a position in a New York City bank for many years, was able to send her to Barnard College as a day student in spite of the depression. Frances says, "It was probably a struggle, but my father believed in education. He was serious-minded for all of us."

She took a premed course, majoring in chemistry. During her freshman year she was barely aware of Hugh Olsen, a big, very blond Columbia University senior, also commuting from Great Kills. He was five years older than she, and they politely said hello to each other when they found themselves on the same Staten Island ferry.

In Frances' sophomore year, however, Hugh rode her home on the bar of his bicycle after a party, on a dare. It was over three miles to Frances' house, uphill most of the way, and the hour was two in the morning. Hugh tied his feet to his bike pedals, the way racers do, won the dare, and began his courtship.

Hugh Olsen had been a first-team swimmer for Columbia (his blond hair, further bleached with chlorine, had earned him the nickname "Whitey"), but he combined his look of big-boned power with shy friendliness. His parents were Finnish, and his father had been a successful building contractor until the depression brought building

CONTINUED ON PAGE 136

Frances looks forward to a decent home for the children. And a social life—something they've never had in Philadelphia. And, most of all, being a general practitioner. She's grateful to Hugh: "He carried the load at home."

: takes fine wood to make

TONE

For the Acrosonic Piano, Baldwin searches the world for the finest woods of all....

Your choice of a variety of styles, including Traditional, Contemporary, Modern, Transitional and Provincial. Complete selection of handsome finishes.

Building a fine piano demands wood of exceptional, and often rare, quality—much as in a fine violin. At Baldwin, woods are selected for their superior resonance, aged long and carefully, then cut like diamonds by craftsmen who care—for beauty, for lastingness and, above all, for music. Only violin-quality spruce goes into the Acrosonic sounding board. Only clearest rock maple is used in tone-transmitting bridges. Only woods like these can create the full, singing tone —the kind of tone usually associated only with large and costly pianos. This pure, clean tone is among the richest of musical sounds. Small wonder that the very sound of the Acrosonic is, itself, an adventure to children. Because music is so important to the development of a child, parents are especially invited to learn more about the Acrosonic and new opportunities for young people in music.

BUILT BY BALDWIN
PIANOS · ORGANS

FREE: THE PARENT'S PRIMER.
24 pages, illustrated. A leading textbook for parents who want to help their children learn piano . . . and enjoy it!
Write: The Baldwin Piano Co., Bldg. 2-A, Cincinnati, Ohio.

ALSO BUILT BY BALDWIN: THE BALDWIN GRAND PIANO, THE HAMILTON PIANO, BALDWIN AND ORGA-SONIC ORGANS

MOTHER IS A DOCTOR NOW!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 134

to a standstill in the middle of Hugh's college years. Hugh's interests were in engineering, and it had been planned that he would go on to engineering school. Then all thoughts of graduate training had to be dropped, and Hugh switched to an undergraduate course in business administration. Hugh says now, without bitterness, "It was a crime I wasn't able to finish in engineering. Somehow I've never been the ambitious type since."

Hugh sat on the porch of Frances' house and did the lettering for her zoology drawings between pacing the streets for his first job. When he found it, he was sometimes too busy to help with her homework, and Frances says, "Then I had to spend hours living up to the beautiful script he had started me out on." During Frances' college summers she worked as a laboratory technician in a Staten Island hospital, but there were Sunday afternoons when Hugh taught her archery with some of the beautiful bows he and his father made at home. She says of the laboratory work, "That was my first view of the hospital world, and the more I saw it, the more I was sure it was what I wanted. But not to be a technician all my life." In her senior year at Barnard, Frances sent out applications to several medical schools, and at about the same time Hugh gave her a beautiful set of arrows with spliced hardwood tips that he had turned himself.

Frances was graduated in June, 1938, and was accepted by New York Medical College for that fall. However, that summer her mother became ill, and her father asked her to postpone medical school for a year. Frances planned to work during the interval, save some money, and enter in '39, but it took her till January to find a job at the Hudson County Tuberculosis Hospital in New Jersey. Five months later, in June of 1939, she married Hugh.

Frances says, "My father was upset and disappointed—but it wasn't really so surprising. I was young, and I believed in being married young. I didn't think of myself as giving up medical school—just postponing it."

In fact, as babies and war years came, medical school grew dimmer on the horizon rather than closer. It was to take an act of sheer self-assertion, thirteen years later, to reverse the trend. Money was short right from the beginning and Frances continued her work at the hospital even after Toby (Hugh, Jr.) was born in February, 1941. They lived in Jersey City, New Jersey, and Hugh commuted to Manhattan while Frances kept a sharp eye on Toby's well-being in addition to her job. "I had a nice seventeen-year-old girl who took care of him. I made the formula myself, before I left for work. In those days I had to have everything just so. I'd had chemistry and bacteriology, and when I sterilized things, they were sterile."

When she became pregnant again with Earl, however, her well-managed combination of career and housewifery collapsed. She uit her job in May, 1942, and for the next five years devoted herself to having—and caring for—babies. Earl was born that October. In May of 1944 the family daughter, Aina Jo, arrived. Roy was born in August, 1945. Frances says, "I was frustrated sometimes during those non-working years, but I still believed in having children young. I had always wanted four—more than I wanted medical school."

These war years took the family to Newark, New Jersey, where Hugh had found a job with a filter company, and in the manpower shortage he was turned into a cost estimator in the field. He found this fairly congenial. "It gave me my start as a materials writer, which is what I am now. I think actually I was happier there than I've ever been."

But in 1946 they bought a six-room house in Staten Island, a move that turned out to be crucial. Frances says, "Hugh had thought we would be happier out there, near our families. But we hadn't been able to afford much of a house, and it was so run down that it was nothing but work. Hugh had planned to commute to Newark, but then he found that was too much, and took a new job in Manhattan. Even that took two hours of commuting each way." Hugh adds, "It was a big mistake."

To Frances, this Staten Island period is one of wretched memory. "Hugh and his father remodeled the house slowly—but terribly slowly; they never did finish. It had an old coal stove for cooking, with a tank at the side for hot water. Naturally, with all those children and all that laundry, there was never enough hot water, and it seemed to me I had to spend all day keeping that stove going. Once I lifted up a stove lid and slammed it so hard it broke in two. Then I was so ashamed.

"I'm sure I took it out on Hugh. I blamed him because I didn't think we should have moved to Staten Island in the first place. But it was a general atmosphere of discouragement which we both shared. I was discouraged by the house, he was discouraged by his terrible long, hard commuting."

Frances stuck it out at home for another year, but in the fall of '47 she went back to work as a lab technician in a nearby doctors' clinic. With a housekeeper, Annie, to help, Frances' children became accustomed to seeing their mother hurry off to work, without, Frances insists, their giving it a second thought. "Toby was the only one in school when I began, but they all appeared to take it calmly. They didn't crowd around my knees at the door—none of that sort of thing. In fact Toby used to boast that at our house everybody got up early. Hugh didn't mind either. He knew it meant a great deal to me, and he wanted me to be happy."

Frances' job helped her face her stove more equably, but it did not really resolve the larger discouragements. Hugh was making about $8 a week base pay. With overtime he often brought home over $100, but the house and the children used every penny. Most of his own $45 a week went for Annie, clothes and transportation. Frances saw a meager future closing in. Hugh's father was a self-made man who, even at the height of his prosperity, had never forgotten how to work with his hands. His mother, never fluent in English, had devoted herself to her husband and son. But Frances' family kept alive a vision of middle-class comfort and the world of the profession. "When mother visited, she couldn't help fussing over all the things we needed. I knew they thought their daughter should have a nice house, and not work so hard—that we should be more comfortably fixed."

The feeling that her own abilities could turn the family fortunes was hard to shake off. Gradually her resolve grew, and in the winter of 1951 she sent out several applications to medical schools. Woman's Medical College in Philadelphia, distinguished for the quality of medical education it offers to women, wrote back and said they would be willing to give her an interview.

She says, "I realized Woman's Medical wouldn't be too anxious to take a woman with four children and no money, out of school for so many years. So I didn't tell them we didn't have any money. When they asked me, I told them my husband would pay for it. My plan was to sell the house."

The college told her that she was too late for consideration for '51, but that she might prepare herself for an entrance examination for the following year.

Frances says, "So—I thought it over. I began studying review books of my undergraduate courses on the bus to work. I also took a course in neuroanatomy every Monday night. I took the exam a year later, and I evidently did all right, because they accepted me. I got the letter in March, 1952. They never did ask me about that course I took. I used to be so sleepy on the trip home after class."

Frances quit her job that June, and she and Hugh spent the rest of the summer rearranging their lives. She says, "There is nothing I'll more grateful to Hugh for than his willingness to come to Philadelphia. Because I certainly wouldn't have broken up my marriage to move." Hugh says, "Actually, I had a pretty nice setup with my job because of the overtime, but it wasn't anything I wanted to do all my life. To tell you the truth, I was sort of fascinated at coming down to Philadelphia. Eve ing the children out of the school they were uited us, because we didn't think it was a good one. Roy had had a terrible start a novice kindergarten teacher. I don't k there was anyone in the family who n't excited by the move."

hey netted $3000 on the sale of the Staten nd house, and in her mind Frances allowed 00 for her school expenses ($800 tuition, lab fee, plus books and transportation), $1000 for a housekeeper for her first year, third $1000 to be set aside for her sophore year. Providence would have to see to rest.

fter considerable hunting, they found a k row house for t in a crowded ion of Northeast ladelphia known Burholme. Steep bs led up to an ovely little porch, the small inte-
, with its dark,
-fashioned wood-
rk looked seedy.
wever, as Frances s it, "It had three rooms, and it was ap enough, and were desperate."
's still their home.
Hugh found a job
h the Budd Comy—at a slight dease in salary; but day ended at 4:30, he could be home bus by 5. The ldren registered in ir new schools,
Frances had time ore the opening of man's Medical to g the curtains and a license for the
g. The family was g in for the coming ars in Philadel-ia.

The following four ars of medical ool and year of erning began right with a crisis. Their ten Island house-per, Annie, had eed to move to iladelphia with the nily (she was going sleep on the living-om couch), but the y before medical ool opened the ildren woke Fran-waving a special-ivery letter conning Annie's apolies. Frances' other came down the run to help t, and Frances ickly found that al help couldn't be d for her budgeted
5 a week. Their first housekeeper had to be id $30 a week plus $2 for bus fare, and ances' father, who was happy to see his ughter going to medical school at last, eed to chip in the extra $7. Frances deibes the housekeeper as "a little old lady o was a poor cook, and wouldn't let anydy in the kitchen—not even me. We ate ggy potatoes for dinner and the minute I me in the door I was met with some horrible ws about what the dog or Earl had done.
e didn't like Earl, and the lack of esteem was utual. She kept feeding him oatmeal, know-g he hated it. One night Earl stuck his finger the icing of a cake she had made, and she nounced she wasn't staying any longer."

While these problems were going on at me, Frances was commuting via three trol-ys to school—a trip which took an hour and quarter each way. Classes were from 9 to 5 eekdays, Saturday from 9 to 1. "When I arted I decided I was going to be a different kind of student than I'd been at college. I had a nice broad top on my dresser, and I fixed it up with two bright lights. That lasted a month or two, but I found I'd be worrying about the children. I'd hear the boys fighting downstairs, or hear cars in the street and think one of them was being run over. I remember walking into class in the mornings and hearing these young girls swear they had studied for six hours, and I'd know I'd had maybe an hour. I got in a good, solid half hour on the trolley. I studied in the bathtub, in bed, and while I stirred something on the stove."

The first few months were the most upsetting. "I wasn't sure I'd be able to keep going because of the help situation. But if I started to feel sorry for myself in the evenings, I'd be told, 'It's what you wanted, isn't it?' Sometimes I'd start to unfold my troubles to my mother. She would say, 'Are you sorry you started? Do you want to quit?' But right from the beginning I knew I was happier than I had been at Staten Island."

Their next housekeeper turned out to be competent. She arrived in time to give the children breakfast, and fed lunch to all but Toby, whose junior high school had a cafeteria. She left when Hugh came home, and it was Hugh who set the older children to peeling potatoes and had dinner ready by the time Frances arrived. The year finished with Frances in a much steadier frame of mind than when it had begun, and A's or B's in all courses.

For her sophomore year, Frances was down to her bottom $1000. She applied to the American Medical Women's Association for a $500 loan. Her sister loaned her another $500, and a friend $350.

The year was one of "plain, hard work. Medical school is different from college—everybody is older, very serious, and very scared of flunking out. I remember my second year most of the class had D's in pathology. I got an old '49 car just before Christmas, when the Staten Island purchasers made their final payment on the house, and Hugh taught me how to drive. I remember the tension as I started out in the mornings. The rush-hour traffic terrified me. Then I'd have to go right from that into pathology class!

"The car eliminated my study time on the trolley, but I could get to school in half an hour instead of an hour and a quarter, so it was less wear and tear that way. The children were still pretty young, and I'd aim to get them in bed by eight-thirty and study for an hour and a half before I went to bed. Hugh helped with everything—the dinner dishes and putting the children to bed. But now that I was home earlier, getting dinner didn't fall quite so heavily on him."

The last two years of medical school were, to Frances, the most stimulating, for "at last you get to clinical work." This is learning right

Hugh Beaumont dreamed of great movie roles. Hollywood decreed otherwise: he is just "a working actor. This has been hard to accept," he says, "but God doesn't measure us by the stardom we achieve." His wife Kathy, an ex-starlet herself, agrees.

"...Between Jobs"

Story of an Actor's Life

By HUGH BEAUMONT and GLENN MATTHEW WHITE

HOW AMERICA LIVES in the June JOURNAL

Today she's . . . Queen of the May

Whatever her fancy, Carter's knows how to dress a young queen for dreaming! This shortie pajama is dimple-knit cotton, airy and cool as a woodland breeze . . . gay as spring's first song. It's machine-washable . . . no-iron . . . like all Carter's soft cotton knit sleepwear and underwear. The perfect gift for young ladies from 3 to 16.

ABOVE: SPRING SONG PRINT SHORTIE PAJAMA, matching panties. Contrasting ruffles, nylon lace trim. Aqua, blue, pink. 3-16 yrs. $3.00.

RIGHT: SLEEP AND PLAY PAJAMA in knit terry. Pink or aqua stripes, matching solid-color shortie pants. 3-16 yrs. $3.00.

Carter's

THE WILLIAM CARTER CO NEEDHAM HEIGHTS MASS

NuSOFT® puts the softness back in everything you wash

FABRIC SOFTENER RINSE

Add it to your final rinse! Works wonders with your wash!

FLUFFY SOFTNESS comes back alive! Even jeans feel nice, towels and sheets are a delight to touch!

"LIKE NEW" LOOK is what NuSoft gives your sweaters, corduroys (see the picture) and blankets. Keeps them looking new, too!

EASY IRONING. No stubborn wrinkles after a NuSoft rinse. Your iron glides along. Most flat things need no ironing at all.

NO MORE STATIC "CLING". Slips rinsed in NuSoft won't ride up.

HOW NuSOFT WORKS: Just add one handy magic capful to the final rinse. Then everything comes out soft, like new.

GOES TWICE AS FAR AS BOTTLES TWICE AS BIG

on hospital floors, and she would have to be at a surgery before eight in the morning, or on a maternity floor during the night. "These are the years you get into night work. You end up with more free time and less intensive studying, but it is harder on the family at home. Except for that, I found everything tremendously engrossing."

These were the years, too, that the family really scratched to get along. The A.M.W.A. gave Frances two more $500 loans for her junior and senior years. One of the Staten Island doctors she had worked for had offered help, and she accepted a loan of $350. An aunt sent a present of $150. She and Hugh eked out her senior year by taking out a $300 bank loan, turning in some insurance policies on the three younger children, and borrowing on their own and Toby's. "That was it," says Frances, and it was also the end of a full-time housekeeper.

"Junior and senior year we found a neighbor up the street, Mrs. Miller, who was willing to come part time. The children were getting more capable. Earl went through a phase of baking that was practically the first quiet thing he ever did spontaneously. He would read the cookbook and then turn out lemon-meringue pies, delicious butter cookies, cakes—oh, delightful cakes. Roy could scramble eggs for breakfast, make French toast, or stir up pancake mix. Luckily, the children hardly ever got sick, but in a pinch Mrs. Miller stayed.

"By senior year Hugh would make sure the children were all up by the time he left at seven-thirty, and they would get themselves off to school entirely. Aina Jo had had her hair cut, and that settled the braids problem. They were supposed to clean up the kitchen and make their own beds. For lunch, Aina Jo and Roy would let themselves in the back door and fix soup and sandwiches. Earl was in junior high that year and had lunch at school.

"When Hugh came home at five, he would usually find the kitchen a mess, and he had the dreariest job of all. He would have to muster the kids, make them wash the breakfast dishes, and get potatoes peeled."

Hugh was now making about $85 a week, and even though Frances was using none of this for her direct education expenses, money at home was a nagging problem. Frances says, "I guess the only way we were able to make ends meet was because my mother kept sending clothes for the children. Toby and Earl were big helps' too. They both had paper routes, and were able to pay for their own bus fares and school lunches and even some of their clothes. Mrs. Miller cleaned up once a week and did our ironing at her house for ten dollars a week—which my father sent. I wore clothes until they were so old I couldn't stand them. I don't think Hugh has bought a new suit since we moved here. I remember the girls talking about hairdressers. Hairdressers! They were talking about Victor of Germantown, and Cecil of Abington, and I said, 'I have mine done by Hugh of Burholme.'"

When Frances was graduated that June she was second from the top of her class. She won a $100 cash prize as the best student in oncology (the study of tumors) and was named to Alpha Omega Alpha, a medical honorary society. Hugh and the children (Frances had written their excuse notes for school herself), her father and mother and father-in-law and an aunt were there to witness her triumph.

Three weeks later, she began a year of internship at Philadelphia's huge city hospital, Philadelphia General. She owed the A.M.W.A. $1500, her sister $500, her friend and the Staten Island doctor $350 each, and the bank $300. This totaled $3000, and there were other smaller but sizable kindnesses from other family members that she wished to repay. And for the coming year she would be receiving the munificent salary of $55 a month.

Frances says, "That year was the hardest of all on my family. Interns rotate four-week tours of duty in the different hospital services, and you have to take the hours that come with the service. For example, general surgery required five nights out of the week.

"The children don't like me to be away at night. That they never have liked. Or away on holidays. That Thanksgiving Earl made the pies, Toby stuffed the turkey, Roy made the cranberry sauce and Aina Jo made the rolls. Hugh fixed the vegetables. I had got in at ei that morning, and they let me sleep till din was ready. That was a nice day—a good d ner too. Then they waved me off to the h pital at eight that evening."

In July of 1957 the five long, rigorous ye came officially to a close. She took her th days of state-board examinations, and September she received her license to pract medicine in the Commonwealth of Penns vania. After some thought, she settled on c year as a resident physician because, "It wou give me a year of extra training, and a lit space in which to look around and find a sp for myself." It is her firm intention to beco a general practitioner ("We need good GP's but the residency in the physical-medicine d partment of her old hospital had some ov riding attractions: regular hours, and sligh higher pay because of Federal subsidies f work in this field. Her salary for the year $3400, free of Federal taxes. She says a lit wanly, "I just couldn't have stood anoth year of being so poor."

Philadelphia General is a mammoth co plex of wings and mustard-colored corrido and in Frances' department traffic is as hea as anywhere, for most of the patients can g about—if not unaided, then by crutches wheel chair. They are off to one of the trea ment rooms, or to the gym, the hydrothera pool, the speech clinic or one of the occup tional workshops, or just visiting in the cor dors, more than they are in one of the t wards. When Frances arrives at 8:30 in t mornings she takes off the jacket of her su slips on a white jacket over her own wh blouse, and begins a busy day. She and a f low resident in the department make t rounds of the wards every morning, and some time in the afternoon she will try to dr in on the ward patients again in the gym or t treatment rooms to see how their therapy going. Besides these, there are the stea stream of patients in the outpatient clinic, r ferrals from other departments, and a fe outpatients whom she sees by special appoin ment. Between patients, there are consult tions with other staffs or with her departme chief, Dr. Albert Martucci, and conferences attend in other fields.

So Frances, too, spends a good deal of tim hurrying down the halls, and she cannot g from second-floor ward to basement gym wit out being hailed half a dozen times. A worrie looking wife visiting her elderly husband dar forward to complain that her husband seem drowsy. Frances finds that an intern has o dered a heavy dose of phenobarbital, and o ders it cut down. She passes a young boy sta ing moodily out the window from his whe chair. He is a new patient who has lost bot legs, so she pauses to say gently, "Hell Arthur. Did your mother get here this afte noon?"

Another visiting wife calls out "Oh, do tor!" and eagerly explains that she doesn think her husband's new shoe fits him. H husband, in a wheel chair, the offending fo propped up, grins sheepishly. Frances giv some directions and says reassuringly, "We start that whirlpool treatment Monday." A she goes away, the wife says sternly to her hu band, "You listen to the doctor, now!"

Frances enjoys talking about her patient but her family hardly lets her at home. If sh is bursting with the news that the young, hand some victim of a dreadful automobile accide relearned to articulate his name today, Toby apt to groan and say, "Who wants to hea about such horrible, depressing stuff?" Hug and the children, who did all that they had t do to see her through her medical training rather enjoy giving her affectionate reminder that at home she is "mother," not "doctor."

In fact, when Frances comes home in th evenings, she puts down her doctor's bag an puts on her white apron with the same capa bility with which she once tackled Toby's for mula or sophomore pathology. She says "Lots of times my friends, even professiona people, say 'How can you bear to leave you children!' I think they picture a group of littl cherubs at my knee. Actually, I don't thin they've been too badly damaged by my career."

They do not look damaged. If Toby an Earl happen into the kitchen at the same time iny room seems swallowed up by their good looks and good health. Hugh and ces are proud that Aina Jo, who looks a clear blue summer day, does well every- she tries—"from making friends to play- iolin in the school orchestra." Roy, who s the world with speculative eyes, has had reading troubles at school, but Frances Hugh are helping him come out of them, he is taking on baseball and friends with ame zest as his brothers, and Frances con- s him the most demonstrative of her sons. ances and Hugh keep "home" a firm, ing organization for the children, and they are home themselves all their atten- goes to it. The evening meal has never be- a slipshod affair. The table is set attrac- in the dining room, and grace is said.

e Olsen children, including Toby and must be in on school nights by dinner- and they don't go out again. Both ces and Hugh know in any given week what all the children are studying, and they are doing in it, and are apt to have rather strong opinions about it. (Frances scornfully of a "social studies" textbook, all about getting along in a big high ol—how to follow the bells and stay on ight side of the corridors—the kind of our teacher used to spend ten minutes on irst day of school!") by is the mechanical wizard of the family, e is so obsessed by electric motors that he it a nuisance to study anything else. He "I get a couple of good technical books the library, but I don't get a chance to them—I have to read Shakespeare in- ." When he was moved to a new high ol, and found it was unequipped with a , he spent his time repairing his friends' r bikes instead of doing schoolwork.

by knows that he could get a job as a me- ic tomorrow, and Frances and Hugh are d that if left to himself he might throw his future promise and do just that. They ncouraged by the fact that he came back a summer job on Staten Island this last reconciled to repeating a half year of ol. But they have laid down the law—no motor-repair side lines until he is doing r at school—and he likes to claim dra- cally that he has given up all his friends He says morosely, "I'm a hermit this Mother's making me be one."

the three other children, Aina Jo and have each an important "best friend" with n they spend the after-school hours. tall and striking, has had no trouble ming a leader among boys his own age, Frances worries that he has "too many ds—a gang of them, and they seem to d most of their time on the streets. As far can tell, boys Earl's age are allowed to the streets after dark until the ten-o'clock curfew. In summertime, even boys Roy's age are out till midnight. I just wonder if their parents even know where they are." Earl complains volubly that none of the others has to obey such strict family rules as he does, but he obeys them. He affects long hair (his mother once threatened him with bobby pins), and a manner of jaunty poise, but he still will come up to her in the kitchen and ask, "Can I do anything for you?" He towers over her, but when she puts both hands on his shoulders and speaks to him about washing his hands for dinner, there is no question but that he is still a boy, still nourished by his family.

When Frances' residency ends this September, she can start a private practice anywhere she chooses. "We'd like a town that is not too rural, for Hugh's work, but not so big that a general practitioner would be lost. Hugh is making nearly $100 a week now, but prospects of great advancement for a materials writer aren't apt to materialize, so he's willing to move. If there were any question about it, I would be willing to stay here and let his job be the deciding factor. As it is, it will be my career, for the sake of a nicer environment."

With private practice, Frances will set herself to discharging, slowly, one by one, the big responsibilities that she shouldered with her medical career. "Of course there are the debts for my medical education. It's been a real joy to have money enough to save this year. I've been putting away over $100 a month, and hope to have $1000 of the $3000 worth of personal loans repaid. We still have to have Mrs. Miller for part-time housework, and I've taken over her $10 a week from my father. Then I have to figure out the details for the capital I'll need to start. It takes about $2000 to equip an office. Some medical-equipment companies do sell on time, or I may be in group practice, or take out a bank loan. But I have to assume that I'll start out owing something over $4000.

"Then I'd like to have $1000 saved by September of 1959 toward Toby's college education. . . . It's hard to persuade children of the value of education when they have two educated parents who haven't done so well, and they see people without education who sport flashy cars, new kitchens, seem to give their children everything. That's why I'm so anxious for us to move to a decent place—so that while they're still young my children will remember something besides a crummy house."

Frances lingers on this vision of a clean white house set on a well-kept lawn, of Toby in college and family prestige in the community, then turns to her tan doctor's bag that sits on the hand-me-down chest by the kitchen door. "I want my children to be able to go to college, and I want some security for my old age, but the real reason I started all this was that I loved medicine. I don't think anybody could go through it who didn't." END

HOW THE OLSENS SPEND THEIR MONEY EACH MONTH

Hugh and Frances' joint monthly income looks like this:

	Hugh	Frances	Total
Income	$419.26	$283.33	$702.59
Tax and Social Security deductions	31.07	4.30	35.37
Net	$388.19	$279.03	$667.22

Frances' only deduction is for city wage tax, but out of her income must come expenses for her car, household help, the children's wages, and $110 a month put aside for repayment of loans for her medical education. Clothes for the children get a big boost from Frances' parents, and the children's substantial allowances take care of their recreation and some school expenses. Frances and Hugh are so busy that the expense for their own recreation is a big zero.

Food	$140.00	Household help	43.33
Rent	75.00	Children's allowances	56.33
Utilities, fuel, telephone	31.50	Church	3.00
Clothing	20.00	School expenses	2.50
Insurance (life, fire, medical)	20.40	Club dues	1.00
Car	60.00	Magazines, newspapers	2.60
Bus	10.00	Bank loan	22.00
Household supplies, dry cleaning, etc.	40.00	Misc.	29.56
		Savings	110.00
		Total	$667.22

Even when these toothbrushes touch they won't spread germs

The toothbrush that won't pass along germs . . .

New Dr. West's "Germ-Fighter" BRAND

You may keep this new toothbrush next to other toothbrushes that "have a bacterial infection." You may even drop it on the floor. Don't worry about it. Your Dr. West's "Germ-Fighter" stays safe to use. Every bristle, the entire "Germ-Fighter" brush head is treated by a special anti-bacterial process*. This enables this toothbrush to inhibit or destroy germs that fall on and hold to it. A germ can pass from another's toothbrush, to your toothbrush, to you. But not when you use a Dr. West's "Germ-Fighter" Toothbrush, the most carefully protected toothbrush in the world!

*Pats. applied for

69¢

Copr. 1958 by Weco Products Co.

LOOK AT BOTH—AND YOU'LL BUY GAS!

Because

TAPPAN Gas Ranges

—cook FASTER!

—cook CLEANER!

—are fully AUTOMATIC!

AUTOMATIC! On a Tappan Set 'n Forget surface unit—Range-top cooking is automatic! This Burner-with-a-Brain "feels" the heat of the pan, raises or lowers flame to maintain proper cooking temperature. Food can't burn.

PRODUCT OF TAPPAN COMPANY, MANSFIELD, OHIO. CABINETS BY REPUBLIC STEEL KITCHENS

AUTOMATIC! Tappan's range-top Rotisserie puts party cooking within easy reach! Spit revolves automatically . . . cook chicken, shish-kabob or just plain hot dogs to perfection. Lets you enjoy "outdoor" cooking indoors.

BUILT-IN MODELS, TOO! Tappan Gas ranges come in different sizes and burner arrangements . . . let you choose built-in or free-standing models to suit your kitchen and your cooking preferences. All fully automatic—of course!

GAS COOKS FASTER! Breakfast-in-a-hurry or dinner-on-time . . . there's never a wasted minute when you're cooking with Gas. Gas gives exactly the heat you want, exactly when you want it. Turn it on, and you can have high heat, instantly. Turn it down or turn it off—and that second, Gas obeys. Never any waste of time waiting for burners to warm up . . . never any hangover heat after burners are off.

GAS COOKS CLEANER! In today's Gas kitchens, walls, woodwork, curtains . . . everything stays cleaner longer. Smokeless, sootless Gas doesn't blacken pots and pans. And the proud owner of a modern Gas range isn't a slave to range-scrubbing, either. Burners lift out for easy sudsing, oven liners and even broilers are easy to clean. In fact, every inch is a cinch to clean.

AMERICAN GAS ASSOCIATION

ONLY GAS does so much more...for so much less!

APPLEYARD BIRTHDAY PARTY

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 67

ntirely for show—all our family feel that is something especially appealing about in a landscape. They seem to belong in ont, where they used to graze in flocks of reds. And so on mother's birthday, and ay, our roast stuffed leg of lamb is strictly ymous, from the butcher in River Bend.

OAST STUFFED LEG OF LAMB

ve your butcher bone a 7- or 8-pound lamb, but do not have him roll and tie eat. Make a rice stuffing as follows, for the bone cavity in the leg. Cut ½ d bacon into thin strips and sauté until . Drain on paper toweling. Save the ings. Sauté 2 cups uncooked rice in 2 spoons bacon drippings till golden, stir-all the time. Pour in water called for e package and add ½ teaspoon saffron ½ cup white or seedless raisins. While rice is cooking, sauté ¾ cup finely ed onion and 2 cloves garlic, peeled crushed, in 3 tablespoons bacon drip-
s. When the rice is almost tender, remove the heat. Add the sautéed onions and along with the cooked bacon and 2 spoons finely diced pimiento. Season
2 teaspoons each salt and seasoned salt
½ teaspoon pepper. Mix all together ly so as not to break up the rice. Rub avity of your meat with a mixture of pepper and 1½ teaspoons powdered nary. Now spoon about half of the ng into the leg cavity. Fold the flap of from the shank end of the roast over ole on the inside of the leg and secure a skewer. Over the opening on the end of the roast, tie a double thickness uminum foil with twine, pulling it tight old the stuffing in (this will be on the om when the lamb is turned fat side r roasting). Now turn the leg fat side up rack, put into an open roaster pan and t in a moderate oven, 350° F., allowing t 25 minutes per pound. Use a meat nometer if you wish, making sure to t the thermometer in the center of a lean muscle and making sure that it is e meat, not in the stuffing. When done, thermometer should register 180° F. Put remaining half of the stuffing in a casse-dish, cover with aluminum foil and set
e. About 30 minutes before serving, heat rough in the same oven with the lamb.
the lamb with 1 can undiluted beef conmé for 20 minutes before the meat is
e. Remove the lamb from the oven. Drain he drippings from the pan except 6 table-ns Blend in 6 tablespoons flour and then ps water. Heat slowly, stirring con-tly, over a low heat until the gravy is oth and thickened. Season to taste with and pepper and serve in a gravy boat. To e the meat, put the roast on a large platsurround with a garland of the extra fing, garnish with fresh tomato wedges, n olives and parsley.

ly son Tommy is out gathering the asparafrom the ancient bed above the garden, ted by an Appleyard cousin many years
The girls and I start heating the big kettle ater while Tommy is outdoors, to be sure e ready when he returns with his basket of slender jade-green shoots. Here's how make

CREAMED ASPARAGUS WITH MUSHROOMS

emove stems from 1 pound mushrooms.
e caps with damp cloth and slice. Sauté tablespoons butter with 1 tablespoon ced onion in a heavy skillet until the hrooms are golden. Break off the tough s of 3 pounds fresh asparagus. Wash the ks well, trim off little spines and cut into pieces. Cover with boiling salted water cook 8–10 minutes until tender. Mean-le, make a brown roux by heating 1 table-on butter with ½ tablespoon flour in a let. When lightly browned, add 1 cup vy cream and heat slowly, stirring con-tly until thickened. Season with ½ teaspoon each salt and pepper and dash of nutmeg. Add the sautéed mushrooms and onions and keep warm until serving. When the asparagus is tender, drain well and place in a heated vegetable dish. Top with the mushroom sauce and a sprinkling of paprika.
Makes 8 servings.

Laura, my eleven-year-old, is washing the various salad greens that will go in Cynthia's

PEAR-AND-ORANGE SALAD

Place 2 small cans mandarin-orange sections in the refrigerator to chill. Peel, core and dice 2 fresh pears. Dip into lemon juice to prevent discoloration, then chill the pear cubes. Just before serving, tear into pieces enough crisp lettuce, romaine and chicory to make about 2 quarts. Drain the orange sections. Add the pears and orange sections to the greens and toss with your favorite French dressing until all are lightly coated. Makes 8 servings.

The crowning glory of the birthday party, in the children's minds, is Dessert. The daffodil cake that the girls and I have concocted for mother is right in the Appleyard tradition—pale gold, light-as-a-feather and supremely delicious. But here is where I go modern. I use a packaged angel-food mix. For mother (and for myself as well), we no longer count the years, but decorate the cake with as many candles as will comfortably encircle the cake.
"Happy Birthday to you," Camilla starts the singing, somewhat off-key, but valiantly, and with great feeling.

DAFFODIL CAKE

Using a packaged mix, make 1 recipe angel-food-cake batter according to directions given.
Flavor with ½ teaspoon lemon extract. Divide the batter in half. Meanwhile, beat 6 egg yolks until very thick and lemon-colored.
Carefully fold them into half of the cake batter, a little bit at a time. Place the yellow batter in the bottom of a 10″ angel-cake pan and top with the remaining white batter.
Bake according to package directions. Invert until cool. Then loosen and invert on a cake plate. Frost with a seven-minute icing.

Seven-Minute Icing: In the top of a double boiler place the unbeaten whites of 2 eggs, 1½ cups sugar, 5 tablespoons cold water and ¼ teaspoon cream of tartar. Have the water in the bottom of the double boiler rapidly boiling. Beat the egg-sugar mixture constantly for 7 minutes with a rotary beater.
Remove from the heat, flavor with ½ teaspoon lemon extract, and continue beating until the icing is the right consistency to spread. Divide the icing in half, and tint one half yellow. Leave the rest white.

To ice the daffodil cake: Ice with alternating yellow and white sections on the top and sides of the cake. To swirl, insert a spatula tip into the icing and draw circles in it around the top and sides of the cake. Decorate the edges of the cake plate with rosettes (tinted yellow) of ornamental frosting into which candles have been inserted.

Ornamental Frosting: Whip 2 egg whites with a fork until frothy. With a spoon, fold in enough sifted confectioners' sugar to make the frosting the consistency to use in a pastry tube. Tint yellow. Then, using a pastry tube, make rosettes around the edge of the cake platter. Insert white candles into the rosettes while icing is still soft.

For the first time this spring, all the windows are open looking out over the porch, and the candles round the edge of the cake flicker in the breeze that blows across the brook. The shining faces across the table show candle flames reflected in brown and hazel eyes. On the dessert plates are lavish helpings of

STRAWBERRY-RHUBARB ICE CREAM

Place the contents of 2 packages frozen cut rhubarb in a glass baking dish. Sprinkle ⅔ cup sugar over the rhubarb and bake in a slow, 300° F., oven for about 35–45 minutes, stirring occasionally, until the rhubarb is soft and the juice is quite syrupy. Cool. Rub the rhubarb and syrup through a food mill. You will have about 2 cups rhubarb purée. Wash and hull 3 cups fresh strawberries. Buzz in an electric blender or force through a food mill.
Stir in 1 cup sugar. Then add 2 cups heavy cream and the rhubarb purée. Mix well.
Freeze to a mush in 2 refrigerator trays. Remove from refrigerator, whip until light and fluffy but still thick. Return to the trays and freeze until firm. If you like, you can make strawberry-rhubarb ice cream in a handchurned or electric freezer according to its directions. Makes 8 servings.

When the last fine-grained slice of cake with its scallop of white and yellow layers has been eaten, and the last of the smooth, rosy ice cream has disappeared, we bring on the final item on the birthday menu: a low crystal dish of violets candied by Camilla and Laura in honor of the season.

CANDIED VIOLETS

Our lawn runs riot with violets—deep purple, white starred with purple centers, even a few rare pink ones. Camilla and Laura choose perfect violets of every shade, picking them while the sun is on them. They beat 2 egg whites lightly, just so that they are broken up. I have sifted confectioners' sugar ready for them in a saucer. They dip each violet in the dish of egg whites, then in the sugar, shake off the excess sugar, and dry in a strainer in a warm place, or in the oven at the lowest possible temperature.

Mrs. Appleyard is opening her presents.
Tommy has made her a bluebird palace from silvery weathered boards. "Hope the tree swallows will keep out this year," he says as he hands it over. Camilla has embroidered a rural scene on a piece of green felt. The smoke from the chimney is blowing in the opposite direction from the wind-blown trees. "It's your house, grandma," she says, "and that's the elm tree and the pond."

"Everything is lovely," says Mrs. Appleyard. "I'll keep these always." The children sigh happily. They know she will. "Let's sing Happy Birthday all over again," suggests Camilla, never one to let an occasion be cut short. So, against the serenade of the frogs in the pond, we do just that! END

THROUGH-OTHER

My English-born mother sometimes used a word which I never heard from anyone else, and never saw in American print — through-other — a word that amused me when I was young, and intrigued me as I grew interested in the beginnings of our language. When mother became enmeshed, entangled or embroiled in recurring domestic crises, she would allow she was through-other; and so saying, she would sidestep sophisticated, Latin-rooted words, like confused or perplexed, to take a harsh and simple one. Confuse, which comes from the Latin word fundere, to pour, plus the prefix con (together), gives a picture of things being mixed or mingled together beyond the power of separation. The word perplex has an even more amusing significance, coming from the word plectere, meaning to plait, to interweave, to braid, to twine, to fold. So my poor mother, when her affairs got completely snarled and out of hand, just reached for a good old sturdy, awkward Anglo-Saxon word which said it all.

MARY K. BLACKMAR

If there weren't any RAISINBREAD
you couldn't have RAISINTOAST for a breakfast
TASTE SURPRISE

CALIFORNIA RAISIN ADVISORY BOARD
FRESNO, CALIFORNIA

DELUXE TU-WAY

opens bottles, punches cans. Oak handle, rawhide thong. Another of the world-famous KITCHEN TOOLS by EDLUND, Burlington, Vt.

ONLY $1.00

Slightly Higher on West Coast

Edlund

GERING Tidy-Mat®

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

POLYETHYLENE PLASTIC

SHELF LINER IN COLORS
Turquoise, pink, yellow, red for:
• Shelves • Cabinets • Closets

ALL-PURPOSE HOUSEHOLD MAT
• Carpet protectors
• Place mats • Many More!

SOLD EVERYWHERE!

GERING PRODUCTS, INC., Kenilworth, New Jersey
GARDEN HOSE • SOAKER and SPRINKLER HOSE • GARDEN TRELLIS • TIDY-MAT HOUSEHOLD MAT • SHELF LINER

MIRRO
Hot and Cold Server

Holds 2 quarts of hot or cold food or liquid, 2 trays of ice cubes. Insulated to maintain temperature for hours.....$9.95

MIRRO-MATIC Electric Fry Pan

Completely immersible! Sturdy stamped aluminum. Practical, popular 11" square, 2¼" deep, holds 4 full quarts. With Cover, Heat Control, Cord and colorful recipe book..... $19.95

Pan and Cover without Heat Control and Cord....$14.45

MIRRO-MATIC HEAT CONTROL AND CORD fits both Fry Pan and Dutch Oven... $5.50

MIRRO-MATIC Electric Dutch Oven

Cook in it, then use as constant-heat, keep-hot server. 5-qt. size. With Cover, Heat Control, Cord and recipe book..... $19.95

Dutch Oven and Cover without Heat Control and Cord.....$14.45

so gracious to give ...so heavenly to have!

It's gratifying to give MIRRO ware . . . to see the sudden smiles and to know that the thank-you's come straight from the heart. But it's almost more heavenly to have MIRRO ware . . . to enjoy, for yourself, the years of fine cooking and pride of possession that each piece bestows.

Think of others, of course . . . but remember to think of yourself!

ask for MIRRO by name

MIRRO Gold Band Percolators

Handsome companion piece to the entire line of MIRRO Gold Band Waterless Cookware.

8-cup.....$5.45
6-cup.....$4.95

MIRRO Bun Warmer

Serve biscuits, rolls, steamy soft or crispy hot. Perforated inner basket. Steam vent in cover. Stainless Steel bail handle. 9½x8½".

$4.95

MIRRO-MATIC Pressure Pans

For fast, effortless cooking, the modern, saving way. Complete with rack and recipe book.

4-qt., $14.95
2½-qt. to 16-qt. sizes, $12.95 to $29.95

MIRRO-MATIC Electric Percolators

Completely Automatic. Perk to perfection, then change to low heat, keep coffee drinking-hot till poured.

9-cup Chrome-on-aluminum, $19.95

Other sizes, styles, finishes, $10.95 to $19.95

MIRRO Automatic Corn Popper

Makes mounds of delicious, fluffy popcorn in minutes. Use it, too, for heating soups, foods, and serving.

2½-qt.....$6.95

MIRRO
THE FINEST ALUMINUM

your best buy...

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping — Replacement or a Refund of Money — If Not As Advertised Therein

Commended Parents Magazine

Prices slightly higher in West, except on pressure pans and electrical items. Federal tax included on all electrical items.

MIRRO Cocktail Set

Soft gold Suede-Tone Alumilite finish. Includes 1-qt. drink mixer, ¾-1½-oz. double-end jigger, and ice tongs.....$4.95

MIRRO ALUMINUM COMPANY • MANITOWOC, WISCONSIN WORLD'S LARGEST MANUFACTURER OF ALUMINUM COOKING UTENSILS

"WHEN I ENTERTAIN"

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 93

s role of sole and oysters, baked with ce."

re are recipes for some of Mrs. Phipps' favorites.

SWEETBREAD TIMBALES IN SAUCE oil 2 large pairs sweetbreads in water to a little vinegar or lemon juice has been

d. Plunge into ice water for a few minutes remove the membranes and tubes. Put gh a food chopper and measure about 4
Mix with 4 slightly beaten eggs and 2 heavy cream. Season with 2 teaspoons 1½ teaspoons monosodium glutamate, easpoon Worcestershire sauce, and ¼ oon each hot red-pepper sauce, thyme narjoram. Sauté ½ cup finely minced in 4 tablespoons bacon drippings. Add long with ½ cup crumbled crisp bacon, easpoon paprika and dash of pepper.
into 8 individual buttered custard cups.
in a hot-water bath in a moderate oven,
F., for 45 minutes or until set. While imbales are baking, prepare the sauce.
two 13¾-ounce cans condensed chicken with ½ teaspoon saffron. Thin 4 table-ns cornstarch with a little cold water.
to broth. Cook, stirring constantly, un-ickened. When sauce is thick and clear, the saffron out. Just before serving, cup toasted slivered almonds and ⅛ oon almond flavoring. Serve timbales lices of frizzled ham with hot sauce ed over all. Makes 8 servings.

FILLET-OF-SOLE CASSEROLE

large skillet heat together 1 cup chicken
, 2 tablespoons lemon juice and 3 spoons butter long enough to melt the r. Lay 2 pounds fillet of sole in the and simmer until just tender, about 3 tes. (Overcooking the fish at this point make it difficult to remove from the to the casserole without breaking.) If can't get all the fillets in at one time, them separately in the broth. Layer the illets in the bottom of a shallow, but-, 3-quart casserole. Next add 2 quarts fresh mushrooms to the broth. Cover simmer until tender, about 15 minutes.
n them well, saving the broth, and aron top of the fish. Add 2 dozen oysters cup oyster liquor to the broth and sim-just long enough for the oysters' edges
rl. Remove the oysters from the broth.
n well and arrange them on top of the rooms. Measure the broth—you should 1¾ cups. If you have more, reduce by ering. Melt 5 tablespoons butter. Add p flour. Gradually stir in 1¾ cups fish mixed with 1 cup light cream. Season 6 tablespoons grated Parmesan cheese, lespoons minced parsley, 1 tablespoon d onion, ¾ teaspoon salt and ⅛ tean pepper. Pour the sauce over the fish.
kle with 1 cup buttered soft bread
bs. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., 0 minutes or until the sauce is bubbling the crumbs are brown. Serve with but-wild rice. Makes 8 servings.

PINEAPPLE SHERBET

n 1 No. 2½ can pineapple chunks. Heat yrup with 1 cup sugar until the sugar is lved. Cool. Pour into a freezing tray and e in the refrigerator until mushy. Sep-6 eggs. Slightly beat the yolks and add p heavy cream and 2 cups milk. Heat, ng constantly, until thickened. Cool.
into a refrigerator tray and freeze until
y. This will take about 2 hours. Buzz ineapple chunks in an electric blender, urée in a food mill. Scrape contents of trays into a cold bowl and beat rapidly end. Add the puréed pineapple, 2 table-ns lemon juice and 1 tablespoon grated n rind. Return to the two trays and e again until mushy (about 2 hours).
the 6 egg whites until they will hold peaks. Reheat the sherbet and fold in egg whites. Pour quickly into 3 freezer s and continue freezing until ready to serve. Makes 3 quarts sherbet. Frozen peaches are delicious served with this.

TONGUE SAUCE

Heat 3 cups beef consommé or broth. Mix 2 tablespoons cornstarch with a little cold water and add slowly to the consommé, stirring constantly. Cook until thickened. In a saucepan, melt ½ cup red currant jelly and add to the hot mixture, along with ¼ cup black seedless raisins. Stir in 1 tablespoon plus 1 teaspoon vinegar and 1 tablespoon each chopped citron and chopped truffles or cooked mushrooms. Makes about 3 cups sauce.

Things Like This I Do Not Understand.
Is it Mere Coincidence,
Do You Suppose?
The Other Night
I Was Reading in My Bed
Just Around Midnight.
Before I Turned Off My Light
I Looked at the Clock and it Said
Twelve O'Clock;
Both the Minute and the Hour Hands Stood Straight Up.

By MERRILL MOORE

I set the alarm for six; turned out the light.
But just then for no reason in the world
I thought of the stonemason,
Charlie Sands,
Who helped me build my sea wall strong and tight Last summer. I had not thought of him for months.

I remembered that I still owed him ten dollars
For extra work, so I made a note of it
On the usual pad I keep beside my bed:
Pay Charlie Sands the ten dollars that I owe him
And went to sleep.
Next morning I woke up
And came downstairs for breakfast, where my wife
Said to me, "It's too bad about
Charlie Sands—
The milkman says he died at midnight last night."

BAKED CARAMEL CUSTARD

Put 1 cup sugar into a skillet and heat slowly, stirring occasionally, until the sugar is browned and liquefied. As soon as the last grains of sugar have dissolved, add 1 cup boiling water, stir briskly and cook until a thick brown syrup is formed. Butter 8 custard cups and put 2 teaspoons of the syrup into each. Scald together 2 cups each milk and heavy cream. Then add the remaining syrup along with 2 tablespoons sugar and ⅛ teaspoon salt. Beat 6 eggs and pour hot milk mixture into them gradually, stirring all the time. Flavor with 1 teaspoon vanilla. Pour into custard cups on top of the caramel syrup. Fill each about ¾ full. Place cups in a pan of warm water and bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., until set, or for about 45 minutes. The custard is done when a silver knife inserted in the center comes out clean. Chill. Turn out and serve.

CREOLE GUMBO

Have the butcher quarter 1 capon. Cut 2 pounds precooked, ready-to-eat ham into 1" cubes (this should give you 4 cups). Put the chicken and ham along with 2 cups water in a deep heavy kettle. Chop enough onions to make 2 cups. Add to the chicken and ham and season with the following: 2 cloves garlic, crushed; 2 teaspoons each salt and gumbo-filé powder; ½ teaspoon each basil and orégano; ⅛ teaspoon pepper; 3 drops hot red-pepper sauce and a dash of cayenne. Simmer, covered, for 1 hour or until the chicken is tender. Remove the meat from the broth. Make a brown roux by sautéing 5 tablespoons flour in ¼ cup bacon drippings until the flour is golden brown (8 slices bacon will give you the ¼ cup drippings). Add the roux to the broth along with 1 No. 2 can tomatoes and ¼ cup tomato paste. Cook until thickened and blended. Remove the chicken from the bones, leaving it in as large pieces as possible. Readd along with the ham to the sauce. Cover and gently simmer for about 45 minutes longer. Stir from time to time to prevent sticking to the bottom of the pan. Crumble the bacon and add. Serve with rice. Makes 8 servings.

CORN STICKS

Beat 4 eggs with a rotary beater. Add 1⅓ cups milk and ⅔ cup melted butter. Sift together 2⅔ cups flour, 1⅓ cups white or yellow corn meal, 6 teaspoons baking powder and 1 teaspoon salt. Make a well in the dry ingredients and add liquids all at once. Stir just enough to mix. Preheat well-buttered iron corn-stick pans. Fill the pans with batter ¾ full and bake for 20 to 25 minutes in a hot oven, 400° F. Makes 28 sticks.

VANILLA-CREAM PUDDING WITH ORANGE-STRAWBERRY SAUCE

In a large pot, bring to a boil 1 quart milk. Mix together 2 tablespoons plus 1 teaspoon farina, 1 cup sugar and 1 tablespoon plus 1 teaspoon unflavored gelatin. Add to the milk, stirring constantly, and cook for 10 minutes. Remove from heat and cool. When it begins to thicken, flavor with 1 teaspoon each vanilla and grated lemon rind. Fold in 1 cup heavy cream, whipped, and pour into a 6-cup mold. Chill several hours until well set. For the sauce, heat 1½ cups fresh orange juice with 2 tablespoons sugar. Add 1 tablespoon cornstarch, moistened with a little water, and continue cooking sauce until thick and clear. Cool. Flavor with ½ teaspoon vanilla and ¼ teaspoon almond extract. Just before serving, stir in ½ cup toasted slivered almonds and 1½ cups sliced fresh strawberries. Unmold pudding and serve with sauce. Makes 8 servings.

CHEESE BLISTERS

Sift 1 cup flour into a mixing bowl. Season with ¼ teaspoon salt and pinch of cayenne pepper. With a pastry blender, cut ½ cup butter and 1 cup grated sharp Cheddar cheese into the flour until the mixture is like a very coarse meal. Add 3 tablespoons very cold water, a tablespoonful at a time, mixing in well with a fork after each addition. Turn the pastry onto a floured cloth, roll very thin, cut into strips ¼" wide and 3" long—use a notched pastry wheel if you happen to have one. Arrange on baking sheets and bake in a hot oven, 425° F., for about 12 minutes or until golden brown. Makes about 7 dozen cheese blisters.

MUSHROOM SANDWICHES

Cook 1 pound mushrooms in a little chicken broth until tender. Drain and cool. Chop into small pieces. Add a small (3-ounce) can chicken pâté, 1 tablespoon mayonnaise, and mix well. Season with 1½ teaspoons lemon juice, 1 teaspoon each finely chopped chives and parsley, ½ teaspoon each salt and onion juice, and a dash of pepper and hot red-pepper sauce. Serve as a spread for buttered, open-face sandwiches. Garnish with parsley. Makes about 1¼ cups filling. END your first package of 4 Fishermen® Fishsticks

FREE!

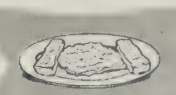
THE PREMIUM BRAND



Send us the wrapper from an 8-oz. package and we'll refund the full purchase price (up to 45¢)—just so you'll discover how deliciously different these fishsticks taste!

Each 4 Fishermen Fishstick is cut from snow-white center fillets—then dipped in golden egg-batter for a delectable, crispy crust! Try them for breakfast, lunch or dinner. But try them soon!

Delicious Plain or Fancy!

with curried rice

atop a cheese-macaroni casserole with scrambled eggs

TO GET YOUR REFUND:

Buy the 8-oz. package—in your grocer's frozen food cabinet now. Remove wrapper and mark purchase price (up to 45¢). Mail the wrapper, with your name and address, to: FULHAM BROS., INC., DEPT. A, 280 NORTHERN AVE., BOSTON 10, MASS.

Limit: One refund to family
Hurry! Offer expires May 31, 1958

YOUR HEIRLOOMS OF THE FUTURE

Boston Rocker Loved because of its great charm and universal appeal...this genuine Early American reproduction is equally at home in today's big, modern "family center" kitchens...in the master bedroom for quiet moments...or in any warm and gracious living room.

Duxbury Delightfully practical and decorative Windsors, authentic in every handsome detail...ideally suited for dining room, breakfast nook, guest room, or occasional chairs anywhere you want one.

Governor Carver Solidly built Windsors designed for dining and endowed with all the sturdy dignity of their Colonial originals – right down to the gracefully turned legs. Excellent double-duty chairs for small homes and apartments.

Since 1857

Nichols & Stone

The Home of Windsor Chairs

Send for Booklet!

"How To Choose The Right Colonial Chair," with helpful ideas, interesting illustrations, and historical information.

NICHOLS & STONE CO.
Box 54, Gardner, Mass.

Please send me your 32-page booklet "How To Choose The Right Colonial Chair." Enclosed is 25c in coin.

Name _____

Street _____

City _____ Zone ____ State _____

HIGH SCHOOL TO COLLEGE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 51

and guide our public policies; the spiritual and aesthetic refinement that bears fruit in our arts. It is from this kind of education that all the major professions—medicine, law, divinity, teaching, the sciences, and increasingly the fine arts and engineering—recruit their apprentices. For it is this kind of education that most fully and effectively develops the ability of the individual to grapple with the difficult tasks demanded by these professions. In increasing measure, too, business and industry are turning to this kind of education for technicians and managerial personnel; and the armed forces, having judged its results in two world wars, have given it a preferred place in their officer-training programs. Thus it is to this kind of education that we must look for the competence that will enable us to survive and, we hope, prosper in the world in which we are fated to live.

In its high-school phase this kind of education comprises the subjects already cited in the Russian curriculum, with English substituted for Russian as the native language and literature. The irony is that we should have to learn anything about the virtues of such education from Russia. For this was the education out of which the charters of American freedom emerged, the education of the founding fathers, the model they bequeathed to us. A full century before the U.S.S.R. was ever dreamed of John Adams and Thomas Jefferson were defining its curriculum, its role in our society and its relation to our form of government and advocating it as the equal opportunity of all Americans. Most of the countries of the western world had esteemed this type of education (as they still do) as the most vital and fruitful of all, yet limited it (as they still do) to a privileged or highly selected few. The United States set an example to the world by opening it up to all who showed the ability and the desire for it.

This is not the first time the U.S.S.R. has taken a leaf out of our educational book. In 1918 progressive education on the then popular American model became the rule in the same Russian schools that have swung far to the other extreme today. After a trial of sixteen years, this curriculum, at first thought to be the perfect educational counterpart of the revolution and its ideals, was found wanting and summarily abolished. During its heyday educational standards sank so low that Soviet officials finally rebelled. They complained that their children could neither read nor write properly, nor do simple arithmetic accurately, and that they were intellectually undisciplined. The result was a decree that brought the Russian grammar- and high-school curriculum back into phase with the curriculum of the English public school, the German Gymnasium, the French lycée, and the academic curriculum of the strongest American public high schools and private college-preparatory schools. At the same time it launched an effort that today enrolls in that curriculum a higher proportion of secondary-school students than in any other country, including our own.

The Russians have bitten off a large mouthful. Already there are signs of vocational alternatives—"polytechnicization" it is called—creeping into the system, accompanied by the creation of boarding schools, both suggesting limits to their academic curriculum's hold over so large and undifferentiated a mass of students. Even so, the scope of that curriculum could be considerably reduced and it would still represent a more ambitious and a more systematic effort to exploit the type of education it embodies in the national and the public interest than we are making, with greater resources and stronger tradition in our favor.

What can we do about it? There is practically no limit to what we can do once we make up our minds it is worth doing. Here is an objective that requires no summit conference with foreign powers, no departure from American tradition, no funds we cannot easily afford and readily provide—in fact, nothing save a clear view of the goal and the courage of our conviction that it must and can be attained. Seldom has an objective as vital to the national interest as this been so surely within our reach.

Unfortunately, most of us get no farther in this direction than damning the schools and waiting for Washington to do something about them. If this attitude prevails, the cause will be lost. Though the Federal Government can help, it is we ourselves in our local communities who must accomplish our educational salvation. I do not say this for traditional reasons—because it always has been so—but because in the nature of the case I believe it must be so. In our scheme of things, education is almost as much a matter of individual conscience as religion is. This is as true of its institutions as it is of its students. In the final analysis, both achieve their greatest heights because they wish to, not because they are compelled to.

DOUBLE ENTRY

By FRANCES BRAGAN RICHMAN

They tell me poetry doesn't pay,
And they're right, I suppose, in a practical way.

Since what does it profit a rose to bloom
Like a lamp in summer's living room?

And the luna moth would appear to be An economic absurdity.

They do not contribute. Except to those Who would hunger and thirst if there were no rose.

Who would fear the dark if created things
Were stripped of their unproductive wings—

Who must pay their way, as the gods arrange,
In different mediums of exchange.

Schools draw their main sustenance, which is intellectual and moral, from the community whose interests they serve; and no matter what outside controls we establish over them, they continue to reflect the character of that community. As an individual may borrow money from his bank and still remain an individual, a community may appeal for and accept Federal aid and still remain a community. Many schools could benefit by such aid; many, it would seem, will languish without it. But the aid itself will merely enable the local community to perform a function which only it can perform, a crutch that makes it possible for the patient to get to work, not a substitute to do his work for him. Educational standards may be proposed by Washington. They will be disposed by the local community. Any further progress toward Federal direction or control would not only touch an extremely sensitive nerve in our body politic; it would almost certainly fail in its objective. Even in the Soviet educational system, with absolute dictatorial power to enforce uniformity and a population conditioned for centuries to accept it, evidence points to familiar disparities in standards and accomplishments: between urban and rural schools, for example; between schools of different regions, for another example; and between schools reflecting different local customs and attitudes, for still another. It is hard to conceive of any American analogy, however benevolent, however severe, that would either smother, or substitute for, local initiative in education.

It will help matters, therefore, if we recognize at the outset that we shall have to work toward our goal in a variety of ways appropriate to a great variety of individual situations and circumstances. The large urban school stripped of support by migration to the suburbs will have one problem on its hands. The rural school in need of consolidation with its neighbors will have another. The school amidst city slums will have urgent business of a nature that rarely comes to the attention of the suburban school surrounded by the families of college graduates and attended by their children; and so on. Public-school life is the private life of the American people turned inside out, in all its diversity, and is hardly more amenable to centralized authority than it is in the home.

Still, we can spend our energies to better effect than damning the schools and waiting for Washington to bail them out of their troubles. Destructive criticism gets us nowhere and we have had a surfeit of it. And the plain truth is that unless there is a change of heart on the part of the public, Federal aid, however necessary, will not bail the schools out of their troubles. On the contrary, it will be more likely to give those troubles a new lease on life. When a bright boy (or girl) who should be taking advanced mathematics elects in its place a course in homemaking so that he can study with his "date," what difference will it make if the waste of talent takes place in a new glass building instead of an old brick one? Or if the teacher or the principal who permitted such a thing to happen has his salary raised? Federal appropriations to either purpose would only amount to a subsidization of error. Before they can do any real good, the public attitude toward education, particularly toward high-school education, will have to undergo a serious change.

Consider, for example, a widespread parental attitude toward two fundamental parts of the educational process: namely, discipline and homework. Without self-discipline there can be no self-education, and without self-education there can be no education. A student learns self-discipline by learning to measure up to discipline which in the first instance must be enforced by authority; and the school that does not teach him this fails him badly. Yet our schools are severely limited in the amount and kind of discipline they can administer; and even in this more often than not they find parents interceding and conspiring against them. The state of affairs in New York where forty-one schools are occupied by the police as these lines are written, seems hardly more than the logical conclusion to such an attitude. Certainly it will improve the schools' chances of keeping order in the classroom to relieve overcrowding through new construction, and to employ more teachers. But until parents generally take a different view of the matter the results are not likely to be commensurate with the investment.

With respect to homework, the attitude of parents often presents an even greater handicap to the educational process. Any student attempting to cross the bridge of high-school-into-college education should be carrying five solid academic courses, and to do justice to these should be doing fifteen to twenty uninterrupted hours of homework a week. Yet I have heard more than one harried teacher complain that such assignments only bring parental intercession; and I have heard principals groan in despair at the same thing. It is hard to understand how anyone can believe in learning without studying. Perhaps it comes from the contemplation of denicotined tobacco, decalorized desserts, or any of the innumerable ways the advertising industry has devised for us to have something for nothing, satisfaction without effort, a gay dance without paying the piper. Or could it be the attitude that seeks greater economic rewards

CONTINUED ON PAGE 146

...MAKES YOUR PUDDINGS

Create your own—in endless variety. Smooth, light Chocolate Pudding (vary with a dash of mint or spice). Candy-flavored Butterscotch. Nut Chocolate—richly chocolate—topped with a walnut half. Elegant Vanilla (alone or with orange or mocha extract).

...MAKES YOUR PIES

Take any pie shell (cracker-crumb shell—or, new, bake shell from a cookie mix). Line with sliced bananas (or any fruit you have). Crown with creamy My-T-Fine Pudding. It's a pie for a party!

...MAKES YOUR PASTRIES

For a small family—or buffet—make tart shells. Or bake cream puffs from a new quick mix. Fill with My-T-Fine Pudding. Vanilla, Chocolate, Butterscotch, Nut Chocolate—why not a choice of flavors?

MY-T-FINE MAKES YOUR BEST DESSERTS

P.S. Only My-T-Fine gives you added iron you need daily.

CHOCOLATE ▪ NUT CHOCOLATE ▪ VANILLA • BUTTERSCOTCH • LEMON • INSTANT AND REGULAR

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 144

for less work applied in false analogy to education? Whatever it is, it diminishes the educational opportunity of all students, not just the gifted; it does great injustice to parents who understand the reason for discipline and homework and actively support the schools in their efforts to maintain both; it costs the schools, their teachers and their students huge losses in time, money and effort, and it represents another poor risk for Federal funds.

Yet another parental attitude that bedevils our high schools is the one that gives the entertainment of spectators of athletic sports priority over the educational needs of their participants. We have seen the excesses to which this attitude could go in higher education where, at least in some quarters, the tide appears to have turned. It would not be amiss for us to give some thought to its effects upon secondary education. I have heard of actual cases of consolidations of struggling high schools, below the optimum in size and strapped for teachers, being obstructed by adult followers of the local basketball teams. And I have heard superintendents and principals give vent to the same despairing sentiments at the inroads of the spectator interest in football as my colleagues in the universities. Few of the latter question the validity of amateur athletics as an integral part of the educational process, nor do I. But I do question whether the entertainment business is; and if I were responsible for the administration of Federal funds, I should want a strict accounting in this regard.

Having introduced a theme primarily affecting men, I now touch upon one of particular concern to women. Persons knowledgeable in such matters inform me that in the election by competent students of easy nonacademic in place of more difficult academic courses, girls are worse offenders than boys. The fact seems surprising, for at that age girls mature more rapidly than boys and are on the average more proficient in academic studies. Why then do they shy away from them?

I suggest two reasons. One is the belief that a course in cooking or marriage-and-the-family will produce, later on, a better home and a happier life than, say, a course in English literature or mathematics. The other is that women, having gained access to higher education, seem not to have gained complete confidence in its fulfillment. Both reasons discount the importance to the country as well as to the individual of the careers open to college-trained women, particularly in teaching where, in the existing teacher shortage, their services are at a premium. Both overlook the vital role that could be played by every mother in the educational life of her children, in directing their energies, supervising their studies, and, beyond and above all, inculcating in them a respect for education and the motive to make the most of it. American education has no greater stake in any of its sources of support than this. It is largely to the mother of the family that it must look for proper attitudes toward discipline and homework, and for co-operation in many other respects. She is the school's partner in the educational enterprise, often the more important and influential partner of the two: and the better her education, the better the education of her children and the better the school. Every girl who has the competence for a solid academic course and spends it on a pleasing or seemingly "practical" nonacademic substitute commits at least as great a waste—often a greater—of as much consequence to society, as an boy.

It should be clear by now that the underlying premise to the theory of high-school education as a bridge to college education is that it be used as such. It is true that we expect other duties of our high schools of great importance to society. Sometimes it seems as though there were few responsibilities for our teen-age citizens that we have not delegated to them. By school-attendance laws, child-labor laws and labor-union practices, we have systematically excluded this age group from the labor market. We have little room or time for them in our homes. We have turned them over to the schools and asked these to bring them up for us. Not all these children are qualified for higher education or even for the academic curriculum leading up to it. Yet they are required by law to remain in school and receive instruction of some sort. For these, alternatives to the academic curriculum are in order, and it is obviously in the national interest that such nonacademic, vocational programs be brought up to as high a standard as obtains in Russia or anywhere else and that funds, facilities and teachers be provided for that purpose. Yet if we are to achieve our main objective, the primary concern of the high school must be its academic curriculum.

The two aims are not incompatible, but they are distinct. Yet as things stand now, their distinctness is not as clear as it should be, and no wonder. They have become confused in a plethora of courses of all kinds and descriptions which have grown in number from around 35 in 1910 to over 300 by 1950. In the process, many have undergone protean changes, as history has into social studies, English into journalism and radio speaking and broadcasting, algebra into general mathematics, physics and chemistry into general science. Meanwhile, home economics has spawned such a numerous progeny that it defies description, with nonvocational industrial arts; vocational trade and industrial arts; business education; health, safety and physical education; music; art; and numerous others programs rivaling it in fecundity. The proportion of students enrolled in these curriculums is large and would be larger if all nonacademic course elections by academic students were taken into account. For the elective system that once ran riot in college education now brings an equal freedom of curricular choice to students in high-school education, and at a look no heel reinforcement to be seen when you wear this Hanes sheer heel stocking with your low back shoes.

surprise yes, this sheer heel stocking is sure to wear because Hanes always knits extra wear into every pair.

ask for style 615—sheer heel, demi-toe, $1.65.

Hanes

no seams to worry about when they are relatively less competent to cise it.

any make this choice, or have it made for n, on a basis that fails to do justice either eir own native ability or to the merits of academic curriculum. For example, it is ly assumed that the vocational curriculums etter suited to students who are not going o college than is the academic curriculum.
assumption rests upon two premises, both to serious doubt. The first is that the lemic curriculum is any less valuable to ents for whom high school is the final edu-nal experience than it is to those for m it is the preparation for higher educa-If the academic curriculum possesses the es I have claimed for it, it could well be ed that it is more, rather than less, impor-to those for whom high school represents last chance at it. The second dubious ise is that present methods of testing and ance according to which students are sep-d and enrolled in the two curriculums are ely reliable. The results suggest that they not entirely reliable, that there is a wide gin of error and waste in which the aca-ic curriculum might prove itself. My own viction is that both vocational and aca-ic curriculums are necessary, but that the lemic curriculum has never been given the ce it deserves of our high-school students ey deserve of it.
is a wary student who can pick his way out stumbling or side-stepping through a thicket. Parental guidance could help provided, as already suggested, such ance is itself informed by higher educa-
. Aptitude tests can help him, but at age 13 4 aptitude is not always fully revealed.
can aptitude tests guarantee motive; and t good is aptitude without motive? In the et Union this student would be prodded coerced by sanctions which are completely of the question with us, whatever results may or may not ultimately yield in Russia.
hort, apart from his own judgment, which ge 13 or 14 is yet but half formed, the erican high-school candidate for the aca-ic curriculum leading to higher education pendent upon his teachers. It is they who will have to help him discover himself. If they see the bridge clearly and see it whole, the chances are he will negotiate it. If they do not see it thus, the chances are that he will not.

My final suggestion is, therefore, that we give fresh thought to our teacher-training programs with a view to strengthening them in the subjects of the academic curriculum. I do not think there is any more crucial point at which the whole problem we have been discussing could be attacked than this. Generally speaking, these programs are replete with courses in methodology which I believe equip the prospective teacher less well than courses in the subject matter he is preparing to teach, combined with the actual experience of teaching, properly supervised, in practice and apprenticeship. Again, if students are to be sorted out according to the distinct aims of the vocational and the academic curriculums, so, I think, should teachers be. Mastery of one or more of the basic subjects in the academic curriculum is a full-time career, as anyone who has attempted it can testify. It is such mastery that gives the teacher his main—indeed, his only real—authority over his students. Every effort should be made to prepare him for the conditions he will encounter in his classroom by anticipating them in practice and apprentice teaching, and by analyzing and interpreting this experience while it is still fresh. But the teacher's most reliable weapon for keeping order in the classroom, and by far his most reliable instrument for discovering candidates for higher education and getting them across the bridge, will be his command of the subject he teaches.

Education, it has often been said, should form a continuity, even a unity, in the life of the individual who experiences it, interrupted only by the physical separation of the institutions he attends. To complete the unity of the academic curriculum we should include its teachers in it as well as their students. Teachers reared in this tradition will be the best hope, too, of educating the public whose attitude is so largely responsible for the present state of affairs.

Money will be needed for all these things. Teachers' salaries will have to be improved, buildings built, necessary equipment installed. But something is needed to supply the money. Not that we do not have it; we have enough and to spare. What is needed is the purpose to spend it on our schools. The Russians have shocked us into an awareness of our educational ills. But shock treatment alone will not cure these. The real cure lies in discovering the place of education in American society that the founders of that society intended for it.

Although the process of discovery has begun, to complete it will not be easy for us. There are so many things to spend our money on other than education, more things than ever existed in any country in the world. If we are to find the rightful place for education amidst all these, we shall have to seek it as Bunyan's pilgrims sought the way to the Celestial City through the teeming alleys of Vanity Fair. There they found "houses, lands, trades, places, honours, preferments, titles, countries, kingdoms, lusts, pleasures, and delights of all sorts" for sale; and they were inveigled by "jugglers, cheats, games, plays, fools, apes, and rogues, and that of every kind." All the arts of salesmanship were concentrated upon them, but to no avail. And when the baffled hawkers asked them, "What will ye buy?" the pilgrims replied, "We buy the truth." END

By MUNRO LEAF

Scratch, crack, crunch—the Record-Wrecker is at it again. Pity the poor family that has one of these around the house, because this careless, foolish creature ruins every record it plays. Record-Wreckers drop and push needles on so roughly they would scratch a record even if it were made of steel. They stack records on top of one another, leave them around on floors and furniture where other people may step or sit on them—and if this Record-Wrecker ever put one back in its right cover and where it belonged the whole family would faint from the shock.

WERE YOU A RECORD-WRECKER THIS MONTH?

Ship'n Shore®

blouses for a no-iron summer!

How does she do it? Lunching here, golfing there, enjoying summer everywhere! It's all so easy with these new Ship'n Shores. They always live up to the no-iron promise of this perfect Dacron-pima blend. Just a dip in suds, a quick drip-dry, and they're on their way! Above: French-collared blouse in plaid-minded checks, 3.98

Ship'n Shore's beautifully bared no-iron scoop with French-type bows. 3.50

Blouses for girls, too: sizes 3 to 6x, 7 to 14...from 1.98

Canadian prices slightly higher. T.M. Reg. in Canada.

At a STANLEY party in my honor, friends presented me with many wonderful housekeeping aids.

Whether you're a bride-to-be or a mature homemaker, you're sure to get a new shopping thrill each time you attend a famous STANLEY Hostess Party.

At these popular, neighborhood affairs your friendly STANLEY Dealer invariably demonstrates some new and advanced-type housekeeping, or personal grooming, aid that's just the thing you've been wishing for.

Featured exclusively at these Parties, you know, are more than 250 Quality-Plus STANLEY Products to save you time and work in housekeeping, and to help you guard the health and improve the grooming of each member of your family.

It's always fun to shop with friends and neighbors at a STANLEY Party. This is one reason why more than 20,000,000 have taken place in U. S. homes to date.

This new "STANHOME" Quality-Plus Liquid Silver Polish is now being demonstrated at STANLEY Hostess Parties. Ask your STANLEY Dealer about this month's special offer on this new item that gets silverware sparkly-clean. Accept your next invitation to be a guest at a STANLEY Party. Better still, give one yourself. Just write or phone your STANLEY Dealer, your nearest STANLEY Office, or write direct to STANLEY'S Main Office in Westfield, Mass.

ORIGINATORS OF THE FAMOUS STANLEY HOSTESS PARTY PLAN
Stanley Home Products, Inc., Westfield, Mass., Stanley Home Products of Canada, Ltd., London, Ont., Stanhome de Mexico, S. A. De C. V., Mexico City, Mexico

(Copr. Stanley Home Products, Inc., 1958)

Send For FREE Home Service Literature

Home Service Department, Stanley Home Products, Inc., Westfield, Mass.

Please send me FREE the helpful literature described below:

☐ How To Have Lovelier Hair

☐ Stanley Moth Prevention Service

☐ Best Care For Your Silverware

NAME .....

ADDRESS .....

CITY ..... ZONE ..... STATE .....

Opportunity To Make Money: Check here ( ) if interested in pleasant way to make $35.00 weekly and up in spare time, $100.00 and more weekly in full time.

MARJORIE TUBBS' DIET OUTLINE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 61

Marjorie's doctor put her on a high-protein diet, told her to acquaint herself with the various calorie counts of foods, and to make well-balanced selections that would keep her within 1000 to 1100 calories each day. Here is a typical day:

Breakfast

CHOICE: Tomato or orange juice, or grapefruit (½), or medium portion of seasonal fruits such as melon, berries.

CHOICE: Poached egg, or cereal (¾ cup) with nonfat milk, or crisp bacon (3 slices).
Dry toast (1 slice).
Coffee, plain or with artificial sweetener.

Luncheon

Clear consommé or bouillon.

CHOICE: Vegetable or fruit salad, or large mixed green salad with hard-cooked egg, or tomato-cottage-cheese salad, or hot vegetable plate.

CHOICE: Fruit-flavored gelatin or fresh fruit (apple, pear, banana) or diet dessert, such as low-calorie pudding. Nonfat-milk (8 ounces).

Dinner

CHOICE: Roast beef, chopped steak, baked fish or fowl, roast lamb (medium portion).

CHOICE OF TWO: String beans, carrots, broccoli, cauliflower, broiled tomato, asparagus, spinach, turnips.

CHOICE: Tomato-and-lettuce salad; cottage-cheese salad, pear or peach halves on lettuce. Nonfat milk (8 ounces).
Coffee or tea, plain.

Marjorie's Reducing Rules

During my diet, and now while I am maintaining my reduced weight, these rules have become my way of life:

1. When eating out: Tell your waitress you do not want rolls or bread and butter served with your meal. If there is a starchy vegetable (potatoes, macaroni or a creamed vegetable) that comes on your luncheon plate, ask if you might make a substitution—such as a portion of cottage cheese instead of the potatoes; plain vegetable instead of creamed. I have found, in this diet-conscious age, that most restaurants very kindly oblige! (Also ask to have your food served without the additional gravy sauce which may be indicated on the menu.)

2. Consider the cafeteria a marvelous place for a dieter. Here you have a chance to make your own low-calorie selection.

3. Control quantities. Usually no second helpings except (at the family table) perhaps salad, and a small piece of meat.

4. Trim off all visible fats from meat; avoid fried foods, rich sauces and gravies, fatten desserts. Cut down on bread, butter, starchy vegetables. I occasionally have half a baked potato, seasoned with salt and pepper.

5. Avoid eating between meals except on most special occasions. Coffee and tea are stand-bys for social snacks. Most hostesses and my acquaintance are not at all offended when a dieting guest resists her tempting goodies. In fact, my friends and family helped and encouraged me in every possible way.

6. Exercise every day during your diet to keep fit and firm.

7. If, after successful reducing, you discover pounds creeping back, don't allow more than three. Get rid of them immediately before they can snowball into pounds.

8. Dress up your diet with some of the many prepared low-calorie foods that are available in most markets: calorie-conscious puddings and gelatins; salad dressings; nonfat milk; artificial sweeteners; diet breads; water-packed fruits.

9. Don't be a slave to the tape measure or scales—but respect them, they're your friends.

10. Broil, roast or boil meats instead of frying. Allow salt for cooking, if you wish, but cut down or out the salt at the table. Flavor your meats and vegetables without adding butter, gravy, sauces. (Your portion can be served separately from the rest of the family's.)

11. Keep your clothes in good repair during your diet. Take in the seams as your weight goes down, and bring your belt in to a smaller notch. You don't want to look baggy when you're on your way to new beauty.

12. Have regular medical checkups during your diet to insure your continued good health. (It's a morale booster to have your doctor pat you on the back and tell you what a good job you're doing!)

VACATION COTTAGES

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 64

To complete cottage No. 1, without furniture, brought the total cost to slightly under $4000. To complete cottage No. 2, again without furniture, brought its total cost to slightly more than $2300. There was no owner participation of labor in either case, which of course would have cut the cost in proportion to the work done. The big difference in the total costs can be attributed to the following (and you can let this be your own cost guide):

No. 1, laid out as a guesthouse, had quite a few partitions; No. 2, as a cottage for vacationing couples, separated sleeping, cooking and living areas, with optional partial space dividers. No. 1 had a complete plumbing system installed, including septic tank; was also wired for electricity. No. 2, on the other hand, though it has running water, carries on with camp-type plumbing, and not only cooks but lights with gas.

No. 1, in the housekeeping version, made use of good-quality plumbing and cooking fixtures and appliances purchased from one of the mail-order houses, but all new. No. 2 made some very advantageous bargain buys of a used gas range and a used gas refrigerator for less than 10 per cent of their original price. Everything else in this cottage was new, but mail-order economy-priced.

The cost differential, therefore, is really a matter of personal requirements, personal pocketbooks.

As a footnote, let me suggest that just because these cottages are comparatively simple to assemble on the site, they are not too difficult to take apart and assemble again somewhere else. Remember, too, that a vacation cottage is a kind of house which cost and use can be shared by friends whose vacation dates don't coincide. And you don't always have to buy a piece of property on which to build them up; you can often lease the use of an ideal site that might be impossible to buy. For instance, a congenial owner of property might very well find much mutual satisfaction in such an arrangement with an appreciative vacationing tenant, and I speak from a latter's personal experience.

Naturalness and simple truth will always find their opportunity and pass current in any age. The freedom of speech of a man who acts without any self-interest attracts little suspicion and odium. MONTAIGNE

The JOURNAL VACATION COTTAGE pattern gives several plan variations in several sizes, together with complete materials lists and full clear instructions; two roof versions; options in types of windows and doors, and various suggestions for vacation-type heating devices, cooking and plumbing equipment. Send $1 to Stanley C. Reese, 70 West 11th Street, New York, for plans. Additional sets $5 each.

OTHER VIEWS, SIZES AND PRICES OF VOGUE PATTERNS ON PAGES 56 AND 57

gue Design No. 9505. "Easy to Make" blouse; 10–20 (31–40). 60c.
gue Design No. 9504. "V.E.T.M." skirt and cummerbund: 24–30 waist measure. 60c.
gue Design No. 9503. Two-piece dress. 10–18 (31–38). 75c.
gue Design No. 9494. Bolero, shorts, slacks and cummerbund; 10–18 (31–38). 75c.
gue Design No. 9490. Two-piece dress, petticoat and cummerbund; 10–20 (31–40). 75c.
gue Design No. 9502. Blouse and skirt. 10–18 (31–38). 75c.
gue Design No. 9382. "Very Easy to Make" one-piece dress; 10–18 (31–38)*. 75c.
gue Design No. S-4871. Coat; 10–18 (31–38). $1.00.
gue Design No. 9506. Blouses; 10–18 (31–38). 60c.
gue Design No. 9210. "Very Easy to Make" skirt with detachable overskirt; 24–30 waist measure. 60c.
gue Design No. 9429. "Very Easy to Make" one-piece dress or jumper dress; 12–18 (32–38). 75c.
gue Design No. S-4878. Jacket, skirt, blouse and slacks; 10–18 (31–38). $1.00.

*Special yardage measurement for this design: 9382 size 14, sleeveless, takes 2½ yards of 45″ fabric without nap. Design No. 9382 is shown on page 57 without front ties.

The Opposite Sex and Your Perspiration

By Valda Sherman

Did you know there are two kinds of perspiration? "Physical," caused by work or exertion; and "nervous," stimulated by emotional excitement.

Doctors say that this "emotional perspiration" is the big offender in underarm stains and odor. It is caused by special glands that are bigger, more powerful, pour out more perspiration. And this kind of perspiration causes the most offensive odor.

Science has discovered that a deodorant needs a special ingredient specifically formulated to overcome this offensive "emotional perspiration" odor. And now it's here . . . the remarkable ingredient Perstop*—the most effective, yet the gentlest odor-stopping ingredient ever discovered—and available only in the new cream deodorant ARRID.

Use ARRID daily and you'll be amazed how quickly this new ARRID with Perstop* penetrates deep into the pores and stops this "emotional perspiration" odor. Stops it as no roll-on, spray-on, or stick could ever do.

You rub ARRID in—rub perspiration out . . . rub ARRID in—rub odor out. When the cream vanishes, you know you are safe, even when you are nervous or stimulated by emotional excitement. Doctors have proved that this new ARRID with Perstop* is actually 1½ times as effective as all leading deodorants tested.

Remember—nothing protects you like a cream . . . and no cream protects you like ARRID with Perstop*. So don't be half-safe. Be completely safe. Use ARRID with Perstop* to be sure. Only 43¢ plus tax.

*Carter Products trademark for sulfonated hydrocarbon surfactants.

Tred-Lite® by Cambridge

TRAVEL LIGHT... ALL DAY

Fabric casuals you can keep fresh and bright — just drop them in your washing machine. Cambridge Rubber Co., Cambridge, Mass.

Can you tie this?

You certainly can . . . with lovely

Sasheen®

the ribbon that makes the "Magic Bow"

Crush, then snip!

Transform your gift packages into blooming beauties with almost-real "Carnation Bows". Make a Sasheen "Magic Bow" . . . directions are on every roll of Sasheen, Decorette®, and Magic Bow® Brand Ribbons. Then crush together loops and simply snip off ends. Result is a gay carnation (nice for boutonnieres, too). Pretty addition: a Decorette "Magic Bow" for lacy background.

"Magic Bow" and method of making patented U.S. Pat. No. RE 23835 © 3M Co.

MINNESOTA MINING AND MANUFACTURING CO.

. . . WHERE RESEARCH IS THE KEY TO TOMORROW

New DANDRICIDE Rinse Stops Dandruff Longer Than Any Shampoo or Tonic

. . . or your money back!

Shampoos or tonics merely dissolve dandruff scales, only to have them return in a few days. New Dandricide rinses loose dandruff OUT, really cleans the scalp, fights the fast return of unsightly, itchy dandruff as no shampoo or tonic can!

Concentrated to last longer! Easy to use!

Because it's concentrated, you get 12 Dandricide rinses in a $1.00 bottle. Just mix with water as directed, rinse and that's all! Good for men, women and teen-agers.

Get Dandricide at beauty and barber shops, drug and department stores. $1.00 bottle lasts for months! Dandricide is money-back guaranteed to keep dandruff away longer than any shampoo or tonic you have ever used. Buy a bottle today!

For trial bottle of Dandricide, mail your name and address plus 25¢ to Dandricide Co., Dept. LH5, 114-12th Street, Brooklyn 15, N. Y. and you will receive a generous three-rinse size bottle. Do it now!

$1.00 For a 3 months supply

STOP PAIN INSTANTLY

COMBAT INFECTION-PROMOTE HEALING

WITH SOOTHING

Campho-Phenique

(PRONOUNCED CAM-FO-FIN-EEK)

USE IT FOR FEVER BLISTERS

COLD SORES, GUM BOILS

Not only do fever blisters heal faster, but the same thing happens when Campho-Phenique is used on cold sores, gum boils. Wonderfully soothing too, for minor burns, poison ivy, itching of insect bites. And Campho-Phenique is a highly effective, pain-relieving antiseptic for minor cuts and scratches from paring knives, can openers, tin cans, etc. Used on pimples, Campho-Phenique helps prevent their spread and re-infection.

THE KNIFE, THE CHAIN AND THE SCHOOLYARD

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 46

used my right name, Lyle, and that is what started it, but I guess they would have used any excuse. They came after me in the first recess. I was just walking around looking, and they got in a circle around me. It started with the usual stuff you expect. Like Lyle sounding like a girl's name. And like asking if I'm an albino on account of with both Bingo and me, our hair is a real light color. I was scared, but not much, because I knew I'd have to fight somebody, and I'd had fights back in the mountains and I knew I was maybe average good or maybe a little better than average.

But I didn't get any chance to fight anybody. They were in a circle. All of a sudden one behind me gave me a big push. And the ones I stumbled toward pushed me back with their fists. I was banged back and forth until I fell and when I got up they kept on doing it. I got to crying, mostly because I was mad, and it kept on and on, and when I didn't get up they started to kicking me so I had to get up. I tried to go after one of them, picking a big one so maybe they would let it be a fight, but they liked the circle game better. Then the bell rang and that ended it. I went to the boys' john and fixed myself up some. I'd skinned my elbows and knees and knuckles falling on the bricks. The inside of my mouth was cut and I had a purple lump under my eye.

At noon I made the cafeteria last long enough so I wouldn't have to go back out in the yard, but when school ended at three I had to go out, and the same bunch got me again and it was the same thing again, only this time my face was sore and it hurt more. They got tired of it and some of them had left, and the biggest one wanted me to wash his shoes with my tongue. They were black and like cowboy boots, only not as high. They could have killed me and I wouldn't. Then a man came out of the school and broke it up. I went in and cleaned up and when I came out they were gone.

Mom made a big fuss about it. Bingo was in about the same shape I was. After she chewed us out and got us painted with antiseptic and bandaged, we got a chance in my room to compare notes. He'd done better than me, because he got a chance to fight. He got mixed up with a bunch that called themselves the Junior Dukes. And he had cleaned up on three of them, one at a time, before one came alo he couldn't lick. But that one couldn't li Bingo. Bingo is nine, but he's a fighting fo His eyes get real pale, and you can't seem hurt him. Since he was eight I can't really li him. Only pin him down so he can't move, t it's no good twisting his arm. He'd let y break it before he'd say uncle.

After dinner dad had a talk with us. I tri to explain how I didn't have a chance to fig anybody, but he didn't seem to understar He said, "I've taught you kids how to u your hands. You're both big for your ag and you're in good shape. Just go after one the group. Win or lose, after you've prov you're no sissy, they'll respect you."

Mom seemed to get the idea better than d did. They came as close as I ever saw them having a real battle about it. She said t gangs were like packs of cruel animals. S said we should move outside the city.

Dad said that was nonsense. He said ki are kids. He said that any sons of his could g along no matter where they went to scho Mom looked like she might cry, but she didn

The next day they left me alone, and couldn't understand it. It made me uneasy had the feeling they were watching me wh ever I went. I made sort of halfway frien with one kid with a bad limp and a steel bra on his leg. His name was Felix.

He said, "That was the Sportsters beat on you. The big one with all the pimples Dewey. He's the captain and he's seventee

"What were they trying to prove?"

He shrugged. "That's just the way they a You got to lick Dewey's shoes, then they you alone, only you got to give them yo lunch money when they want it."

"I won't lick any shoes. They'd have to k me first."

Felix gave me a funny look. "They cou do that too."

It gave me a funny feeling, but I told m self he was nuts. You don't get killed in schoolyard. But after school something ha pened that made it all seem different. The was a quick fight in the yard near the ga Kids all ran toward it and then it was over a they all were running away faster than they run toward it. One of the Sportsters walk out real fast, holding onto his own arm. Blo

Ask any WOMAN

By Marcelene Cox

She's the kind of woman who recopies a grocery list.

A boy probably reaches maturity when his judgment falls into step with his energy.

All any woman need do to make a house a home is to go away for a few days and leave the family alone in it.

In the way a fisherman sits on a bank, smoking, not betraying to the fish what he has in mind, a woman seeking matrimony never shows by word or deed she's out to make a catch.

When a brand-new wife fails to achieve perfection, she should take solace from the fact that, contrary to popular belief, a new broom doesn't always sweep clean; frequently it sheds and makes quite a mess of things.

According to the obstetrician, the newest baby in our family was born "sunny side up."

If you have a daughter, the honk of the wild goose may not be heard from the sky overhead but from the driveway outside.

The bride writes home: "Remember, mother, how I used to tease you when you wanted a new dishpan or something unromantic for a present? Well, I take it all back. Yesterday, my husband asked me what I wanted for a two weeks' anniversary present. Since he caught me in the middle of scrubbing the floor I replied without hesitation, 'A sponge mop.' So, today I have a new sponge mop and it seems like a very romantic present to me."

A small boy turned loose in the spring should be bounded either by the watchful eye of his mother from the kitchen window, a high board fence, or a police force. And even so, just crossing a level strip of yard he will manage somehow to nearly annihilate himself.

My grandmother said it succinctly: "Listen twice; speak once!"

dripping off his hand. A kid lay on his k holding his hands over his bloody face, ng his head from side to side and scream-in a funny gasping way. I walked home , and I didn't say anything about it.
go's face was lumpy again, but he didn't ht to talk. He had a kind of closed-up look ut him. A look of secrets.
n Wednesday there were cops in the ool, and Felix told me that one of the rtsters named Jigger had got in a fight a Black Duke they called Booboo. Boo-had taken out a switchblade knife and cut ger's arm, and Jigger had taken his chain whipped Booboo across the face with it it had taken out an eye. The cops were king for Jigger and most of the Sportsters skipped school.
Maybe I should have told my folks about it,
I didn't. I thought it would have sounded whining, and my dad had said I could get g anywhere. I had thought I could, but I n't sure any more. I felt a funny emptiness my stomach. Because I knew they'd be after again.
ut it didn't happen until Monday, after the fuss had died down. They came after in the morning recess. The circle formed, when I got the first push I kept right on ing and broke out and ran to the wall and my back against it. They crowded around, ning at me. So I asked if they were so ken one of them wouldn't fight me. It was right way to say it.
Dewey picked one of them. "You take him, ey," he said.
guess Sooey was maybe fourteen, a real k-set boy who was already starting a beard.
ot of other kids came around to watch.
ey waited too long to get serious about it, he was easy to hit, and I hit him good, as and hard and often as I could, aiming like told me once at his nose and mouth bese that discourages them the quickest. He t down on one knee and I stepped back he came up yanking a chain out of his loops. I saw it flash and I ran inside it and whistled down and hit me like fire across back. I went as crazy mad as Bingo does, ess. He dropped the chain and then he had nife, and I got the knife wrist and twisted d and it fell and I snatched it up and he s close and for a crazy moment I wanted to k it into him. He stood with his mouth and s wide open. Then the craziness went away.
was like being in some kind of movie. It was han-thing, and I didn't feel ready for manngs. I suddenly felt like a stupid kid with a fe in my hand. So I bent over and put the de under my heel and pulled up on the hilt
I snapped it off. It was very quiet. So quiet eard the wind go out of Sooey. I dropped hilt in front of him and turned away and y opened up for me and let me through.
d the bells rang and I went in, but I didn't r a word the teachers said.

Dewey and another Sportster whose name idn't know caught up with me on the way me. "Relax, kid," Dewey said. "Want to
."
They took me four blocks out of my y and down an alley and up some outside irs to a crummy room. Dewey had a key to
It was full of beat-up furniture and empty r cans. And there was a record player.
sat on the couch with the strange kid bee me and Dewey sat on the rickety table ing us.
"This is the pad," he said. "Every Sport-r gets a key. We get some good parties up e."
"So?"
"We got the best group. Nobody pushes us ound. I talked to the guys. Maybe you can me in. But you got to be initiated."
"Then I get to push the other kids around."
"That's the way the ball bounces, Whitey."
"I don't like that name."
"You take the name we give you. That's ur Sportster name. Whitey. You're younger an most kids we take in. So we won't give u a car heist for initiation. Something sier. Maybe one hundred hubcaps, and you t to get them all in the same night."
For some funny reason I thought of the ss picnic back in the mountains, how the smelled and how we sang around the fire, and then went home in the buses, singing all the way, a big moon looking like it was moving right along with us.

"You stink," I said, "and this room stinks and the Sportsters stink."

You think there's a thing that nothing in the world can make you do. Maybe if I was a man I could have had more guts. But the way they twisted the chain around my hand was too much. I went home and I went to my room and after I had washed my mouth over and over, and after I was on my bed crying as quietly as I could, out of humiliation, I thought I could still taste the oily dust of his shoes on my raw tongue.

They let me alone, in a way, after that, but it wasn't really being let alone. You never knew when you'd be ganged and held down while they took the lunch money. The first time they did it, they took the Swiss army knife with all the blades that I had gotten for my twelfth birthday, and they took the good-luck Chinese coin one of dad's foremen had given me. It turned out to be smarter and easier to hand them the money when they asked for it. The gangs ran the school.

So I was lonely at school, and lonely at home. Bingo wasn't the same any more. He had kind of a tough quiet look about him. And then, in late November, he came home from school one day with a chain for a belt, and he wore a big steel ring on his middle finger with a snake head on it. He went back out again that night and didn't come home until midnight. Mom and dad waited up, and they sent me to bed, but I went to the head of the stairs when he came in.

Dad couldn't pry anything out of him. He answered every question by saying he'd just been "around." Dad thrashed him and sent him up to bed. I didn't hear Bingo cry. They were downstairs talking in low voices. I went to Bingo's room and opened the door. He banged a bureau drawer shut and spun around.

You can't taste the difference, but

Sucaryl makes it lots easier to cut down calories

LEMON PUDDING WITH RHUBARB SAUCE

1 envelope gelatin
½ c. cold water
3 eggs, separated
1 tbsp. Sucaryl solution
1 tsp. lemon rind
⅓ c. lemon juice
¼ c. nonfat dry milk solids
¼ c. ice water
3 c. diced rhubarb
⅓ c. water
1 tbsp. Sucaryl solution
2 tsp. cornstarch

Sprinkle gelatin over cold water; let stand 5 min. Beat egg yolks; add 1 tbsp. Sucaryl, lemon rind, juice; cook in top of double boiler until mixture thickens. Add softened gelatin; stir until dissolved. Remove from heat; cool until slightly thickened. Beat egg whites to soft peaks; fold into gelatin. Combine dry milk solids, ice water; beat to texture of whipped cream; fold into gelatin. Pour into individual molds or a 1-qt. mold (slightly oiled). Chill. Serves 8. Rhubarb Sauce: Combine rhubarb, water, 1 tbsp. Sucaryl. Cook on low heat until rhubarb is soft; mash with fork. Add some to cornstarch for paste; return to rhubarb in saucepan. Cook rhubarb in saucepan until thick. Cool and serve on pudding.

FREE—Our new cookbook, "Calorie-saving Recipes with Sucaryl," including dozens of new kitchen-tested ideas for desserts, beverages, sauces, dressings . . . 50 wonderful recipes in all! Get your free copy at your drugstore.

Sucaryl simply says you don't have to trim portions to trim calories. No compromising your taste, either . . . any dish sweetened with calorie-free Sucaryl tastes just like its sugar-sweetened twin.

You use Sucaryl practically anywhere you would sugar. In tablet form, to sweeten your coffee, tea or any other drink. In solution, for fruits and cereals, for cooking and baking.

Sucaryl, of course, is for anyone sensibly counting calories, and for those who for any other reason can't use sugar. Low salt diets call for Sucaryl Calcium. Abbott Laboratories, North Chicago, Illinois and Montreal, Canada. Abbott

New Table Bottle at Drug Stores Everywhere

Sucaryl®
Non-caloric Sweetener—No Bitter Aftertaste

An information-packed article about your baby's care, feeding, growth and fun.

Taking Steps to Help Your Baby Walk

Tips on first baths...

New way to wean your baby...

▪ Encourage your baby to walk, but remember that coaxing or forcing can upset and discourage him. Holding on to your hands is great sport. Just don't overdo it, or baby may learn to depend on this system. Let your cherub walk barefoot on a safe surface as much as possible; it helps develop strong foot muscles. Before long, your creeper will take off on his own two feet in all directions—and you'll take off right after him!

▪ Biggest excitement since baby's first tooth is the day he starts walking. When will he step out? Wiry babies often totter around at 10 months. An easygoing child, or a chubby, may not try till 18 months. Average: 12 to 15 months. Let baby kick, creep and pull himself up. Walking takes courage; also muscles that are ready and able.

▪ Slow-motion baths suit your little baby best. Hold him securely, talk to him softly—so baths will be fun and not frightening. For the first few weeks, your doctor may suggest that you give baby sponge baths instead of tub dunkings. Keep baby cosily covered with a blanket and wash just one part of him at a time, so he won't get chilled.

▪ Heinz new apple-based juices are enriched to give baby all the vitamin C he needs daily. They can even substitute for Heinz Strained Orange Juice! Try tasty Apple, Apple-Grape Juice, Apple Juice with Apricot, Apple Juice with Pineapple, Apple-Prune Juice.

▪ Want baby's menu balanced for sure? Serve Heinz' new High-Meat Dinners. Each Dinner contains more than 3 times the meat in ordinary meat-and-vegetable combinations; also, more iron and vitamins. By adding milk, and baby fruit juices to the menu, baby's meal is balanced nutritionally! Four tasty High-Meat Dinners—Strained and Junior.

▪ National Baby Week Offer: Heinz spill-proof tumbler free to your baby! Wonderful for weaning, Heinz plastic tumbler (pink or blue) has a lid with a spout which lets milk flow through at the right speed for beginners. Send your name, address and 12 labels from any Heinz Baby Foods to Heinz Baby Foods, Box 28, D-20, Pittsburgh 30, Pa. Offer expires midnight, June 15th, 1958.

▪ The right time to start weaning differs among babies. You won't want to try if baby's been sick, teething, or still seems to need lots of sucking.

Over 100 Better-Tasting

HEINZ Baby Foods

• Strained Egg Yolks ▪ Strained Baby Foods

▪ Baby Fruit Juices • Junior Baby Foods • Strained and Junior Meats

▪ Pre-Cooked Cereals • Teething Biscuits ▪ Strained and Junior High-Meat Dinners

"What the hell do you want?" he asked.

I pushed by him and opened the drawer. There was a lot of junk in there. Pencil flashlights, fountain pens, packs of cigarettes, lighters. I pushed the drawer shut and sat on his bed.

"You steal that stuff, Bingo?"

"What's it to you?"

"What's with the chain and the funny-looking ring?"

"I'm a Junior Duke."

"You're a punk like the rest of them."

"What do you know about it? I heard how you chickened out. I know all about you. I heard how you licked shoes and how you turn over your lunch money. I know how you get pushed around. There's got to be somebody in the family isn't chicken."

I thought of Sooey and the knife and I stood up and I wanted to hit him. He read it in my face and he dropped back a step and flicked the chain free with a practiced gesture and the loose end rattled on the hardwood floor and he stood there waiting, his face pinched and closed, with a city-kid tough look about him. And I thought of how he'd been when we'd been in the mountains, when his face had been open and you could tell what he was thinking.

I just looked at him and I said, "Bingo. Bingo." I just said his name.

And he looked down at his hand holding the chain and he looked at me and something seemed to crumple a little behind his face, and his eyes got narrow and shiny and he said, haltingly, "But what can you do? What in hell can you do?"

So I left him there and I went downstairs in my pajamas, and dad and mom stared at me. Dad said, "I thought I sent you to bed a long time ago. There's been enough trouble around here. You go on back up there, boy."

I couldn't keep my voice from trembling. I said, "Dad, this time don't treat me like a kid. Just for a little while. I've . . . got to talk to you, honest. It's important."

"Is it about Bingo?" my mother asked.

"Partly," I said, and I knew then that I was going to have to snitch on him, but if I was going to be grown up, that was part of it. But I was going to have to explain how it wasn't Bingo's fault.

"Sit down, Brud," dad said.

"We've got to get out of here," I said. "We've got to!"

I told them how it was. Exactly how it was. My mother had gotten very pale. Knots stood out at the corner of my father's jaw. They asked me questions and the questions helped me remember more about it. Toward the end my father was pacing back and forth across the small room, making the floor creak.

"Aren't there any good kids?" he asked. "I don't get it. Can't the good kids team up?

"There's more good kids than bad kids, dad," I said. "But as soon as they team up then they have to get in rumbles with the gangs that are around already, and then you have to fight with chains and rocks and zip guns, and hang around together all the time."

He stopped in front of me. "So that was the choice you kids had. Join up or stay out. Join up and be a thief and a criminal, or stay out and be a punching bag for gangs of vicious animals. Brud, I'm proud of the choice you made."

"Don't be hard on Bingo, dad. If he'd been just a little older . . . if he'd had a little more time where we used to live. But the thing is . . . we've got to get out of here. I mean I can stand it. But ——"

And then, hard as I tried to prevent it, I turned right back into a darned kid. I stretched out on the couch with my head in mom's lap and was comforted.

I heard dad say, "I'd read about this juvenile delinquency, Mary, but I didn't know that it resulted in a setup where a decent kid has no choice. Or a poor choice."

And that's why we're out here in Cedardale in the new house. Dad is eighteen miles from his job, and so he isn't home as much, but things are better. It isn't as nice as the mountains. Bingo has gotten into a lot of trouble in the new school, but each time the trouble isn't as bad, and I think he's coming around to the way he used to be. But it was awful close.

For me, I have a funny feeling about it all. I keep thinking that there must have been some way I could have handled it. I feel as if the school down there had licked me. And I feel older than these other kids in my class here in Cedardale.

And a lot of times I think of the good kids down in that neighborhood in Athenia. I was able to get out.

But what if I was one of the kids who couldn't get out?

That's what I think about a lot.

JOURNAL MOTHERS REPORT ON CRUELTY IN MATERNITY WARDS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 45

There can be no disagreement on one point: If women in childbirth are subjected to needless pain or discomfort or danger for the convenience of a hospital or a doctor; if what at best must be an ordeal is turned into a veritable hell, as many of our readers tell us, the situation must be corrected!

Charge No. 1. "At one hospital I know of it is common practice to take the mother right into the delivery room as soon as she is 'prepared.' Often she is strapped in the lithotomy position, with knees pulled far apart, for as long as eight hours."—Registered Nurse.

This charge aroused considerable indignation among other nurses. A number wrote to give reasons for the strapping down.

"Lay people often do not understand why hands are tied. They are cuffed comfortably at the patient's sides to prevent contamination of the sterile field. Is it so difficult to understand why her legs are in padded stirrups? From waist to toes she is covered with sterile drapes. The doctor uses sterile gloves and a sterile gown. Infection was the greatest cause of death not too many years ago, so with the elimination of contamination mother and child are healthy and alive!"—R.N., Esmond, Rhode Island.

"Registered Nurse probably never had a baby or she would know that the lithotomy position is quite comfortable during labor. As a matter of fact, nothing she mentioned is too painful, speaking from experiences on both ends of the delivery table."—R.N., Van Nuys, California.

"The steel shoulder braces used at time of delivery are for the mother's protection. They keep her from falling off the table in case of an emergency—if her head has to be lowered quickly, as in shock."—R.N., Houston, Texas.

"As for keeping the patient in stirrups for eight hours—first, the pain and misery to the poor woman are obvious; I have yet to see a doctor deliberately increase these. And, to introduce a practical note, it would be difficult to tie up the delivery room for that long. What would they do with other mothers who are delivered in the meantime?"—R.N., Long Beach, California.

And now let us see what our Journal mothers had to say about being strapped down. Many told of having been kept in restraints for hours.

"My husband brought me to the hospital six hours after my labor pains began, and I was immediately rushed into the labor room. The nurse prepared me. Then, with leather cuffs strapped around my wrists and legs, I was left alone for nearly eight hours, until the actual delivery."—Jackson Heights, N.Y.

"My obstetrician wanted to get home for dinner. When I was taken to the delivery room my legs were tied way up in the air and spread as far apart as they would go. The tight bar put across my chest and shoulders made me feel as though each breath would be my last. When I was securely tied down, I was left alone."—Walnut Creek, California.

had my baby six months ago. My legs ust now beginning to feel normal, after ng been held in that position for hours." zeman, Montana.

edical opinion on strapping down: It is ap- rd obstetrical practice, when delivery is nent, to put the mother's hands in cuffs, her n stirrups. This is to prevent contamination e sterile area. But it should be done only at ery last, and for a period which generally around twenty minutes, seldom more than . To strap the mother long in advance of ery and leave her there is indefensible.

ge No. 2. "On one occasion, an obste- an informed the nurses on duty that as going to a dinner and that they ld slow up things."—Registered Nurse.

angely, this charge that babies are held from being born in order to suit the doc- convenience drew few denials from nurses doctors, though it is a far more serious than strapping down in advance of de- .

lly half of our mother correspondents wrote at they had endured the ordeal of having babies artificially held back from birth be- the doctor was not on hand.

was strapped on the delivery table. My or had not arrived and the nurses held my ogether. I was helpless and at their mercy. held my baby back until the doctor came he room. She was born while he was wash- is hands."—Marietta, Georgia.

One of my babies lowered before the es were expecting her (I was just put on a ery table with no at- ants). When the nurse y examined me she d for another nurse to he doctor immediately e she strapped my legs her and gave me ether old the baby until the or arrived. The doctor to come eight miles, and by the time he ed and prepared for delivery it was a cle the baby was still alive."—Avalon, consin.

The doctor dropped by at 6:45, cast me a hful glance and went out to make house . One hour later my legs were released the stirrups and held together by a nurse, sat on my knees, up on the delivery , mind you, because the baby was coming ast. A few minutes after 8 o'clock the doc- rrived and allowed my baby to be born."— ta, California.

When my baby was ready the delivery n wasn't. I was strapped to a table, my tied together, so I would 'wait' until a e convenient and 'safer' time to deliver. he meantime my baby's heartbeat started ring. At this point I was incapable of nal thought and cannot report fairly the wing hour. When I regained conscious- I was told my baby would probably not

She did live. She is healthy, normal and her first steps last week. I am grateful to doctors and nurses who worked so hard skillfully to save her. I am grateful that is alive and happy. I do not believe the ment I received was intentionally cruel— 'hospital routine.'"—Hamilton, N. Y.

well-balanced woman indeed, who can ount the unnecessary peril to which her was exposed, because the baby was d. Unfortunately, not all such cases had appy an outcome.

The granddaughter of a neighbor is hope- y brain-injured because nurses tied the her's legs together to slow down the birth l the doctor arrived."—Phoenix, Arizona.

Medical opinion on holding the baby back, ding the doctor's arrival: completely in- nsible. Says one leading obstetrician, "It ver done in my hospital. I would not tolerate ut the nurses should not be blamed in such s. They must carry out the orders or wishes he patient's doctor.

rge No. 3. "One [doctor] I know does ting and suturing operations without sthetic. He has nurses use a mask to e the patient's outcry."—Registered se.

This charge also received little attention from defense witnesses. The exception was a blanket denial of all of Registered Nurse's charges, signed by six resident doctors at a hospital for Women in Washington, D.C. "I have never witnessed or heard of an act in a delivery room that could be considered inhumane. Steel clamps over shoulders and chest? Eight hours in lithotomy position? Legs tied together? Cutting without anesthetic? Masks to stifle outcries? This is too incredible to be seen even in horror comics!"

While our nurse in Van Nuys, California, explained and defended the practice. "There are times following delivery when anesthesia is contraindicated despite the necessity for sutures, and anyway, at the time of delivery the perineum is literally without feeling."

What do our Journal mothers testify on this point? A few mentioned it—in comparison with the number who had been strapped down for long periods, or had had babies held back.

"I was a newcomer to this country, and was not prepared for the way we mothers were herded like sheep, strapped down and cut and sewed—without being given anything to ease the pain."—New York City.

"When the doctor began to cut, I screamed. It was the final indignity of so many. The doctor snapped at me, 'You may as well shut up; we've run out of Novocain.' By that time I was too exhausted and dispirited to care very much."—St. Louis, Missouri.

Medical opinion: It is hard to believe that any doctor would perform an episiotomy on a patient who is not already under general anesthesia, without first applying a local anesthetic. Such an act would be indefensible. The point should be made, however, that women do not always realize they have had a local anesthetic, for they are aware of the cutting even though they do not feel the pain.

Thus Journal mothers, as well as a number of nurses, confirm the charges made by Registered Nurse. They add a number she did not mention.

Charge No. 4. That women undergoing labor are left alone for long periods of time, even in the delivery room. The husband often is excluded from the labor room at the time when the wife needs him most.

This, again, was a charge brought by many of our mothers.

"When I had my first baby I was left entirely alone for most of my sixteen hours of labor."—Haddonfield, New Jersey.

"I have had eight children in the past fifteen years, in four different hospitals, and have no reason to think that other mothers were treated any better than I. I was left all alone most of the time although I begged to have my husband with me. They would not allow him in."—Waseca, Minnesota.

"My first child was born in a Chicago suburban hospital. I wonder if the people who ran that place were actually human. My lips parched and cracked, but the nurses refused to even moisten them with a damp cloth. I was left alone all night in a labor room. I felt exactly like a trapped animal and I am sure I would have committed suicide if I had had the means. Never have I needed someone, anyone, as desperately as I did that night.

"My second child, thank heavens, was born in a wonderful Georgia hospital. My dear wonderful doctor sat in a rocking chair by my side in the labor room. Following the delivery, when I was moved to my room, my baby and my husband went with me and we had a cozy get-together in the middle of the night. Everything about this experience was simply marvelous and I'd be so happy to go through it again."—Somewhere in Georgia.

Many mothers who had had contrasting hospital experiences reported smoother, easier deliveries just because some sympathetic person was with them.

Medical opinion: It is admittedly a harrowing experience for a woman in labor to be left alone, particularly at night. The bravest, most maternal woman cannot help having some apprehension as her baby's birth approaches. To Love is a short word, but it contains everything.

GUY DE MAUPASSANT

"Listen Edna, please don't say anything to anybody yet, but...

"You know those appliances that I've been dying for . . . well, Harry says we've saved enough money and I can go out and buy them tomorrow. Really, Edna, Harry is so smart! A year ago, he explained that in any well-run business, a part of the income is put back into the business itself for future improvements. So, we set up a savings plan—regular savings from Harry's salary, and savings I made on running the household. And Edna, we got a lot of help from our Insured Savings and Loan Association. We started saving there because we know our money is safe and carefully managed—and we get good returns. Our money is insured, too, by an agency of the U. S. Government. Really, it's the most popular place to save nowadays."

For a new kind of family peace of mind . . . why not open a savings account first thing at your nearby Insured Savings and Loan Association where savings are insured up to $10,000 by the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation.

WHERE YOU SAVE DOES MAKE A DIFFERENCE

Look for this symbol of safety where you save

FEDERAL SAVINGS AND LOAN INSURANCE CORPORATION SAFETY OF YOUR SAVINGS INSURED
UP TO $10000

This message is sponsored by The Savings & Loan Foundation, Inc., 1111 E Street, N. W., Washington 4, D. C.

be left alone as the pains grow harder, and she becomes tired, thirsty, hungry, is calculated to increase her fears. On this account, the first stage of labor is the worst for many women. It frequently lasts ten to twelve hours with nothing much happening; staff members, therefore, are inclined to give their attention to patients who need them more. Few hospitals have enough nurses so that one can be with the mother at all times. But wherever possible, nurses should be on call, and should drop into the labor room often to cheer and reassure the mother. A mother should on no account be left unattended in the delivery room.

Charge No. 5. That childbirth suffering is treated callously, in some instances to the point of actual brutality.

Incidents were reported under this charge that would be unbelievable if they had not come so spontaneously from such obviously intelligent mothers in so many different parts of the country. From nurses too.

"The cruel treatment expectant mothers often receive in both the labor and delivery rooms would make many civilized people shudder. As a young nurse, I was shocked and quickly disillusioned that humanitarians could be so inhuman. So often a delivery seems to be 'job-centered'—that is, get the job done the easiest, quickest way possible with no thought to the patient's feelings. In too many cases doctors and nurses lose sight of their primary concern—the patient."—R.N., Los Angeles, California.

"During my second baby's arrival, I was strapped to a table, hands down, knees up. I remember screaming, 'Help me, help me!' to a nurse who was sitting at a nearby desk. She ignored me. With my third baby, the doctor said at one point, 'Stop your crying at me. I'm not the one who made you pregnant!'"—Haddonfield, New Jersey.

"As a registered nurse, I have seen nurses who themselves had children become impatient (or worse) with a patient and express their feelings, often within her hearing. 'She got herself in this fix and now is a poor time to change her mind.' Or, 'They have to suffer.' This, to me, is untrue, and the poorest of psychology."—R.N., Urbana, Illinois.

"A patient recently came to the hospital where I nurse, with a fractured hip, incurred in the delivery room of another hospital. She had complained of pain but had been unable to get anyone to pay any attention to her."—Practical Nurse, South Carolina.

"The anesthetist hit me, pushed my head back, sticking her fingers into my throat so I couldn't breathe. She kept saying, 'You're killing your baby. Do you want a misfit or a dead baby? You're killing it every time you yell for the doctor.' . . . When my husband saw my bruised neck, face and arms, he questioned the doctor and was told that first mothers knock themselves around. Perhaps I shouldn't complain—my baby boy is healthy and not a misfit as I worried he would be. But I have listened to nurses laughing at other new mothers who were crying out in pain, I have heard other mothers being slapped and threatened with dead babies and misfits. I heard these things while I waited for the births of my second and third babies. What happens to the women who are threatened this way and then do deliver a misfit or a stillborn? Do they spend the rest of their lives blaming themselves? Do the words of these sadistic nurses and doctors forever ring in their ears?"—Homewood, Illinois.

Medical opinion: Unfortunate things can happen when staffs are overbusy and overtired. Nurses who slap patients or abuse them verbally should be fired; a doctor who takes out his weariness and irritations on patients has no place in obstetrics. However, women in labor sometimes misunderstand and misinterpret what happens around them. A nurse may quite properly suggest to a woman that she stop screaming and use her strength instead to push. There is no excuse for the attendants in the case last cited.

Charge No. 6. That mothers are treated with cold indifference—run through the birth process by "assembly-line" techniques.

This was one of the more frequent complaints, and many mothers seemed to feel that to be viewed as mere mechanisms, somehow subhuman, was worse than actual sadism. The phrases "assembly line," "not treated as if I were a human being" figured in many letters.

"The sadism described in Registered Nurse's letter is but one aspect. There are also the terribly apathetic manner of many doctors and nurses, the abrupt separation from loved ones and the total lack of emotional preparation (in some cases) which make childbirth a traumatic experience for many women."—Manhasset, Long Island, N.Y.

"Many normal deliveries are turned into nightmares for the mothers by 'routine' obstetrical practices. I have had two such experiences. My third baby will be born at home, despite the sterile advantages of a hospital confinement, for I feel the accompanying emotional disadvantages are just not worth it."—Columbus, Ohio.

And another Columbus, Ohio, mother: "More babies are born than ever before; doctors are hurried; there aren't enough nurses to go around. But our biggest enemy is smugness and indifference—the smug belief that everything will be all right, the shutting out of husbands at this crucial time. And locking us up in lonely labor rooms, shuttling us off to delivery rooms among brusque strangers like sacks of potatoes for the A&P. Grandma had her man with her, and a doctor that cared about her, knew her."

A woman doctor writes, "I have been associated with several obstetrical departments as a medical student, an intern, a medical resident and twice as a patient. The most critical thing that can be said of them is that because of overfamiliarity with childbirth and the establishment of necessary routines, they perhaps neglect some of the tender loving care which a woman in childbirth might enjoy."—Wilmington, Delaware.

Medical opinion: With so many women being delivered in hospitals, there is a possibility that the care may become mechanical. This is something that must be watched for and preven all the time by alert heads of hospitals and stetrical departments.

Charge No. 7. Degradation of motherho and womanhood. An attitude that becau she is bearing a child, a woman forfeits h right to womanly dignity and respect.

Today's women accept the fact that usual rules of modesty must be suspend insofar as necessary examinations and servi by nurses and their doctor are concerned. I some of our mothers had the feeling that tendants carried this to the point of indign and outrage.

"And what about the nameless parade 'interns' who appear unannounced, pro our trapped bodies and 'scan' our pro ress? . . . Since my husband is a veterinari I happen to know that even animal matern cases are treated with a little more grace th is accorded human mothers."—Detroit, Mi igan.

"I reached the point where I wouldn't ha been surprised if the man who was wash the windows had suddenly laid down sponge and come over to 'take a peek.' seemed that everyone else connected with hospital was doing it!"—Des Moines, Io

"I am a registered nurse with postgradu experience almost entirely in obstetrics. I also the mother of three children. I have ne seen gross cruelty. I have, however, seen ca less and callous treatment of obstetri patients, along with indifference and courtesy. I have seen nurses more intereste flirtatious conversation with the doctor in the patient's comfort. I have seen nu be careless in screening patients from pu view during procedures requiring their bo to be exposed, to the outrage of the patie feelings of modesty. I have heard such thinking remarks as 'You had your fun, you can suffer' made by a nurse to a mot in great distress, damaging the spiritual nat of the childbirth experience and showing nurse's ignorance of the sacramental nat of sex in marriage."—R.N., Long Island, N edical opinion: Indeed, the heavy flow of pa nts through maternity wards today may le to some carelessness unless those in au- th ty are constantly on the watch. It should be nid, however, that failure to appreciate the sp ual aspects of marriage and childbirth, fa re to respect the woman in childbirth as a wo an, is an indefensible violation of medical et s.

e have presented the testimony for and ag nst the general charge that in some ma- ter ty wards, childbirth is rendered a greater or al than it needs to be, because of atti- tu s of attendants or because of unnecessarily pa ful practices.

e believe the nurses and doctors who tell us ey have never seen brusqueness, much less sa m, in a labor or delivery room. A nation- all famous doctor calls attention to the mag- ni ent record of his profession in cutting de n maternal and infant mortality—a record to hich the Journal has also called attention ma y times. We fully endorse this doctor's co ment that this "has not been accomplished by areless or brutal obstetrics nor by neg- le " Readers in many sections of the coun- tr have borne witness to great kindness and sy pathy in busy maternity wards.

ut the response from nurses and mothers in cates inescapably that this is not always the ca , and that instances of callousness toward su ering, or unethical measures that actually in ease suffering, are not so rare as our editors ma hoped they are. We believe responsible do ors and nurses will join with us in insist- in that these violations of man and medical ethics m t be stopped. We would al call the attention of re onsible doctors and m es to another danger p nted up vividly by our re lers' letters. This is a tr d toward *de*humanizing th greatest emotional and sp itual experience given to a woman—the bi ging of her baby into the light, into her ar s.

Until a generation ago, a normal childbirth w a natural, essentially happy event, at- te ded by the husband and a kindly neighbor o wo. Even in hospitals, friends might cheer th mother in the labor room; her husband, or so e other person close to her, could stay w h her until the baby was born. Now child- b h has been turned into a medical mystery, c ducted in secret. In most hospitals, the w man in childbirth is cut off from those who lo e her, at her time of greatest travail.

A number of psychiatrists have been con- c ned at the disturbance to family solidarity a l maternal instincts brought about, so they b eve, by excluding the father from partici- p ion in the birth of his child. How much w se when the mother, thus isolated, is d ied ordinary kindness and sympathy; is s jected to tortures completely contrary to g d medical practice!

Nurses cannot question the orders or pro- c ures of doctors; they cannot openly criti- c e hospital routines or the behavior of col- l gues. Hospital heads may be unaware of t treatment accorded patients in labor or d ivery rooms. Many of our readers accepted i ignities or abuses as unavoidable—until t y read Registered Nurse's indignant letter.

A number, including nurses, suggested a r urn to home deliveries as a solution. But it i hard to find a doctor nowadays who will c nsent to a home delivery, even when the m ther is perfectly well and normal and no c mplications are anticipated. (No one would d pute that dangerous or difficult births call f hospital facilities.) Today most women in u nfortable circumstances are required to go t hospitals to have their babies.

Our mothers do not ask for pampering. We don't expect to have our hands held by u derstandably busy nurses and doctors. But it doesn't seem unreasonable to look for a cer- t n degree of respect for the patient's f lings." So a Houston, Texas, woman ex- p ssed it.

Around 90 per cent of the women who wrote to us pleaded, however, "Let us have our hus- b nds with us." Is it such an unreasonable request? This one change in present hospital rules would abolish practically all the nightmare features of which mothers have complained. With a husband present, there is little likelihood that a woman will be slapped or yelled at or subjected to uncalled-for tortures. It will give the mother the support and reassurance of a loving presence. It will provide her with the small comforts that mean so much, yet without taxing the hospital staff. Someone to hold her hand or rub her back; to wipe the perspiration away or bring the cooling drink.

If you love the good that you see in another, you make it your own.
ST. GREGORY THE GREAT

We earnestly urge the medical profession to review the rule which bars the husband from his wife's side. We believe he should be allowed to be there at least until the doctor arrives to take personal charge. If the wife wants her husband in the delivery room—not all women do—he should be permitted to be there. If the husband cannot be present for some reason, some relative or friend should be allowed to take his place. Many mothers who had their husbands with them tell us in lyrical terms of the help this was. Whatever the reasons for placing at the mercy of strangers the woman undergoing childbirth, are they vital enough to offset these factors?

Other excellent suggestions have been offered by mothers, doctors and nurses:

1. Mothers should "shop around" a bit before selecting an obstetrician. An Independence, Missouri, mother remarks sensibly, "When buying a new home, a car or even appliances you check several before buying. You should check a doctor as well."

From a medical school in your state, or a big hospital or from your local medical association, you can obtain a list of skilled obstetricians in your vicinity. Learn something about these men. Ask your women friends what reputation they bear among their patients. If a physician habitually fails to get there when the baby comes, if he "puts mothers under anesthesia regardless," these things very soon get noised about among women. It is also proper to visit several doctors, obtain their ideas about conducting childbirth, then choose.

2. There should be more explaining of childbirth to mothers in advance. They should be prepared for such discomforts as are necessary for their welfare and that of their babies. A number of hospitals hold classes in the techniques of childbirth, quite a number conduct tours through the maternity ward for mothers who expect to be delivered in the hospital. More of this kind of thing should be done for expectant mothers.

Expectant mothers, too, have a responsibility to take the initiative in finding out what childbirth entails.

3. There should be freer communication between doctors and their patients. Mothers should feel at liberty to express their fears to their doctors; to tell the doctors what they would like them to do.

4. If a mother is subjected to treatment that she considers cruel or unethical, it is her duty to report it to the local board of health, or the hospital head, or some other person in authority. A criticism made of Registered Nurse was that she had not reported the outrages she had witnessed to the American Medical Association. Doctors concur that a nurse cannot do this—if she wants to continue in the nursing profession. The patient can, and all reputable physicians would like her to do so.

The greater part of the medical profession is as interested as laymen could possibly be in wiping out bad practices where they exist. This has been amply proved. But let us not lose sight of another need.

A Frankfort, Kentucky, reader has phrased this need admirably: "Every woman should be treated like a queen, even with her tenth! Not with excessive attention (yes, I know we're short of nurses) but with good humor and joy in the occasion!"

We at the Ladies' Home Journal agree.

Ladies' Home Journal representatives visited all writers (excepting only the two who wrote anonymously) who are quoted in this article.—ED.

Choice Brown Cultivated Mushrooms Ready to Pick!

BinB Mushrooms are superior in flavor because they are the choice brown variety of cultivated mushrooms—broiled in creamery butter and packed in tasty butter-enriched mushroom broth.

Give meals a party touch with delicious BinB Broiled in Butter Mushrooms, prepared as called for in your favorite recipes.

Enjoy all three ready-to-use styles BinB BROILED IN BUTTER MUSHROOMS

WHOLE CROWNS
Perfect with Steaks

SLICED
Tasty in Omelets

CHOPPED
Ideal in Sauces

FREE! 32-page Recipe Book. Write: BinB Mushrooms, M-2, West Chester, Pa.

OPPORTUNITY

IF YOU want extra money and have free time to put to use, this is for you! Spend your spare time taking orders for magazine subscriptions—and earning generous commissions.

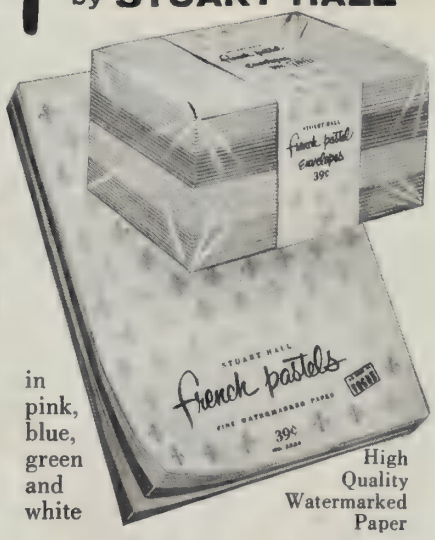
Just send us your name and address on a postal. In return, we will send you our offer with starting supplies. From then on, YOU are the boss! Subscription work of this type can be carried on right from your own home. As an independent representative, you may work whenever it is most convenient for you.

Information and supplies are sent at no obligation to you. Write that postal today to Jim Stewart,

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
329 Independence Square, Phila. 5, Penna.

VARICOSE VEINS

Tired Legs, Leg Cramps Relieved By The NEW



Dr Scholl's Super-Sheer 51 GAUGE ELASTIC STOCKINGS

NYLON • FULL-FASHIONED • FULL-FOOTED

So sheer, they look just like regular nylons. No over-hose needed. Give comfortable, uniform support to varicose veins, tired, aching legs. Help prevent leg trouble during pregnancy. Colors: French Nude, White, Black. Only $12.95 pair. At Drug, Dept., Surgical Supply Stores and Dr. Scholl's Foot Comfort® Shops. For booklet on Foot and Leg Care, write DR. SCHOLL'S, Dept. E-2, Chicago 10, Ill.

NEW! IN AMERICA the continental touch in fine writing papers

French pastels
by STUART HALL

in pink, blue, green and white

High Quality Watermarked Paper

The Padette—80 sheets of letter-size mixed Pastels. Padded in the continental way—for convenience, neatness and easy-writing.

Pastel Envelopes—36 envelopes in mixed pastel colors . . . ready to match or mix with pastel papers in over ■ dozen bright color combinations.

Only 39¢ each at stationery counters everywhere another fine paper product from Stuart Hall Kansas City 8, Missouri a flavor treat you can eat and eat!

New England has long been famous as the home of real baked beans. And "down east" in Maine they bake beans best. B&M Brick Oven Baked Beans are slowly baked in real brick ovens, in a flavor-rich brown sugar sauce with generous pieces of tender selected pork in the traditional way. Enjoy this flavor treat with B&M Corn Relish.

B&M brick oven

BAKED BEANS

They're Extra Good with B & M Brown Bread

SEALED OVEN-HOT IN BOTH GLASS JARS AND TINS

BURNHAM & MORRILL CO., Portland, Maine

Simply Great Teen Cooking

At the Olsens' in Philadelphia, four teen-agers run the kitchen.

By LIANE WAITE

"Of course we can cook," Aina Jo, 13, proudly told me, "and Roy does the shopping." Their mother and father, Frances and Hugh, have full days away from home—she as a resident doctor and he as a materials writer. These teen-age cooks manage on a budget of $35 a week, do most of their own shopping and have developed their own recipes. They know food prices intimately, are up-to-date on new products and are aware of which foods are their best buys.

Each Saturday morning, Roy attaches the family shopping cart to his bicycle and rides to the store to do the marketing. This means early rising and considerable maneuvering. Not an easy task for a 12-year-old. Earl, 15, prepares the morning breakfasts. Jeans-clad and sleepy-eyed, he makes his way to the kitchen and comes up with anything from bacon and eggs, sunny side up, to corn bread.

Toby, 17, confines his cooking to more reasonable hours of the day, specializing in casserole dinners. There is a great deal of humor about their accomplishments, with the family voting each dish a success or a failure. "They're real good," Frances says, and sits down to dinner with complete confidence.

Here is a favorite recipe and menu from each young Olsen—proud accomplishments of these four teen-age cooks.

Toby's Saucy Meat Balls prove he likes to eat though his mind is also buzzing about electronic gadgets and cars. "It's the greatest," says Earl.

Saucy Meat Balls and Spaghetti
Tossed Green Salad
Ice-Cream Sundae
Coffee or Milk

Saucy Meat Balls: Chop enough onions to make 1⅓ cups and enough green pepper to make ⅔ cup. Melt 2 tablespoons butter or margarine in a skillet. Add onions, green pepper and 1 peeled and crushed clove garlic. Cook gently until the vegetables are tender and slightly golden. Add two 10½-ounce cans tomato soup, 2 of beef bouillon and 4 teaspoons lemon juice. Simmer slowly. Turn 2 pounds ground beef into a large bowl. Moisten 2 cups bread cubes with a little milk. Squeeze dry. Add to the meat along with 2 unbeaten eggs. Season with ½ teaspoon salt, a dash of pepper and a pinch of basil. Mix thoroughly. Shape into balls about the size of table-tennis balls. Melt 2 tablespoons shortening in a skillet and brown the meat balls, a few at a time, first on one side and then on the other. Turn them carefully. When browned, put in a casserole. Pour the hot sauce over them. Cover and bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 30 minutes. Serve with hot spaghetti. Makes 6 servings.

Earl, with his mind on sports, seems an unlikely candidate to be cooking breakfast. But his early-morning treats win him family fame just as his success on the soccer field won him his school letter. These French Waffles are quick and easy, take little effort and few dishes. Aina Jo rates them almost higher than anything—she washes his dishes.

Orange Juice
French Waffles and Bacon
Milk and Coffee

HOW AMERICA LIVES

French Waffles: Use bread that is rather dry and thickly sliced. Spread each side of the slices with softened butter. Then dip them in a mixture of ½ cup milk, 2 slightly beaten eggs and ¼ teaspoon salt. Do this quickly so that the bread is only coated with the egg mixture, not soaked. Bake in a waffle iron as you would a waffle until it is golden and sizzling. Serve with maple syrup and bacon. The batter recipe is enough for 6 slices of bread.

STUART

For Aina Jo's teen parties—bubbling-hot pizza pie and ice-cold beverages.

DI PIETRO

Aina Jo admits that when she was first introduced to a pizza pie she was dubious, but it looked good and smelled even better. After a timid try she plunged right in and perfected her recipe. Now when her friends come over they have a pizza party using this recipe and menu.

Pizza Pie
Relishes
Fresh Fruit
Milk or Soft Drink

Pizza Pie: To make the crust, mix together 2 cups prepared biscuit mix and ½ cup water. Turn out onto a floured board and knead for about 1 minute. Do not be afraid to work this dough. It should be a little tough. Flour your rolling pin and flatten the dough into a 16″ circle. Fit this into an aluminum pizza pan measuring 14″ across. Crimp the edge of the dough onto the sides of the pan to hold it in place while the pie is baking. Chill while making the filling.

Filling: Sauté ½ cup finely chopped onion and 1 peeled and crushed clove garlic in 2 tablespoons salad or olive oil. While this is cooking, thinly slice ¼ pound mushrooms. Add to the onions and cook until they are golden. Dice and drain 2 No. 2 cans tomatoes. Add them and ¼ cup tomato paste to the skillet along with the mushrooms, onion and garlic. Season with 2 teaspoons mixed Italian seasonings, ½ teaspoon seasoned salt, ¼ teaspoon salt and a dash of pepper. Stir and bring to a simmer. Spread ½ cup grated Parmesan cheese on the crust. Spoon the tomato mixture over the cheese. Top with a sprinkling of 1 cup sliced salami cut into wedges or strips and slices of Mozzarella cheese—about ½ pound. Bake in a hot oven, 425° F., 20–25 minutes, until the crust is browned and the filling is bubbling.

Roy confines his culinary efforts to sandwiches—big, hearty and terrific. These Hoagies, as he calls them, are eaten any time. They are made to fill the bottomless pit in a boy's tummy.

Hoagie Sandwiches
Fruit
Milk

Hoagie Sandwiches: Split a 10″ Italian roll in half the long way. Be sure that you leave one side hinged. You will need it. Spread the top and bottom of the cut sides with softened butter. Now start layering; first lettuce, then thinly sliced boiled ham and a few slices hard-cooked egg. Sprinkle with salt and pepper. Next a few thin slices of tomato, dill pickle and sliced Swiss cheese. Spread with mustard. Makes 1 sandwich for a big appetite.

LOW IN FAT...YET

High in Food Energy

ROYAL PUDDINGS

Yes, mothers . . . ROYAL PUDDINGS are low in fat . . . yet high in food energy . . . every delicious serving gives your family all the benefits of milk PLUS 74% more food energy than the fresh whole milk you make it with.

LOW IN FAT | HIGH IN FOOD ENERGY

ONLY Blue Bonnet
OF ALL LEADING MARGARINES
Looks, Cooks and TASTES LIKE
THE "HIGH-PRICE" SPREAD because

BLUE BONNET MARGARINE HAS "FLAVOR GEMS" LIKE THE "HIGH-PRICE" SPREAD!

TWO FINE PRODUCTS OF STANDARD BRANDS INC. © 1958, S. B. INC.

ANYTHING YOU CAN CLIMB

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 42

into his prep-school German—"Ein Platz wo man spazierengehen kann."

"Oh," said the clerk. "Ja. The man will be here soon. You may ask him."

"Oh, good!" Elizabeth said. "I knew there'd be something!"

"Would you ask him to look us up when he gets here?" Stanley said, and the clerk smiled and nodded. "I hope he speaks English," Stanley said to Elizabeth, and she laughed.

"I think you did quite well," she said.

They went to their room, and changed their clothes and washed. When they got downstairs again, the clerk pointed to a sun porch and said, "The man is there. He is waiting for you. He speaks English good."

"Thank you," Stanley said. They went onto the porch, and saw a man who could have been anywhere from forty to sixty; he was small and thin, and had a bristly blond mustache. His eyes were a pale china blue, and the skin of his face was tanned and hard and full of tiny wrinkles. He wore a wool shirt and long leather trousers, and on his feet were heavy boots. A shapeless green hat was clutched in one hand. When he saw Stanley and Elizabeth, he stood up and came toward them.

"Mr. Stanley?" he asked.

"Yes," said Stanley. "And this is Mrs. Stanley."

"Madame," the man said, bowing slightly. To Stanley, he said, "My name is Ernst. Ernst Grimsel."

"How do you do?" Stanley shook hands with him, and felt the ironlike quality of the man's hand, although Ernst did not grip him hard. "Mrs. Stanley and I would like to do some walking while we are here," he said. "We're told that you know something about it."

Ernst smiled, and his teeth were ragged and uneven. "Yes," he said pleasantly. "I do. Here—let me show you." They followed him to the window, and looked out at the surrounding peaks. On the ground, the shadows were darkening, but the tops of the mountains were bathed in a pink glow, and the sky overhead was still a faint blue-green. "You can have whatever you want," he said, and, starting at the extreme right, he pointed out the mountains. "You can have the Jungfrau, but that is not much—a train goes most of the way up—or you can have the Finsteraarhorn, the Schreckhorn, the Wetterhorn or the Schwarzhorn. The Finsteraarhorn is farthest away, but it is the tallest. The Wetterhorn is nearest." He pointed to a peak that towered, high and sharp, almost directly over the town.

There was a short silence. "Oh," Elizabeth said at last. "Well, what we had in mind was more of a ——"

"For beginners, the Wetterhorn is really the best," Ernst went on. "I took an American lady up there just two days ago."

"I see," said Stanley. He cleared his throat, glanced quickly at Elizabeth, and said, "I guess we'd better do the Wetterhorn, then. After all, it's not the mountain we're interested in, so much as the exercise." He carefully did not look at Elizabeth, but peered out the window at the jagged peak. "Incidentally, how high is that?" he asked casually.

"It is not very high," Ernst said, and grinned. "It is about thirty-seven hundred meters above sea level. From here, not nearly so much."

"Well, actually, what we were thinking of ——" Elizabeth began, but Stanley cut her off.

"Thirty-seven hundred meters?" he said. "That comes out to—thirty-seven times three-plus—about to twelve thousand feet, then, doesn't it?"

"Yes," Ernst replied. "A little more."

Elizabeth turned to Stanley. "You know very well ——" she started.

"Well, Mosquito Peak, in Colorado, is more than that," he said quickly. "I climbed that when I was a mere boy." To Ernst he said, "Fine. When do we start?"

"Tomorrow morning at six." Ernst thought a moment. "You will need to rent shoes and crampons," he said. He explained that the crampons were for walking on snow and ice, and were iron spikes that would be fitted to their shoes by a blacksmith in the village. He gave them the name of a place to rent the shoes, and told them to be sure to have two pairs of heavy socks. "The rest of it, the hotel will do," he concluded. "They will give you the food you want to have for two days."

"Oh," said Stanley. "That's what it takes, is it—two days?"

"Yes," Ernst replied. "If everything goes right."

"Norton, don't you think we ought to talk this over?" Elizabeth said, a note of desperation creeping into her voice.

"Nonsense," Stanley said briskly. "You heard him say he took a woman up there just the other day. What is there to talk over? This'll be the best exercise we can get—just a simple climb."

She was quiet, and Ernst said, "Oh, yes—you will also want to have snow glasses. The sun on the snow is very bright."

"Right you are," said Stanley. "Snow glasses." He paused and cleared his throat. "We won't need—ah—picks, or axes, or anything like that, will we?"

"No," Ernst said, and smiled. "I have my own ax. I cut the steps, and you just follow. You are roped to me, so you cannot fall."

"Oh, good," Stanley replied. "Splendid." He laughed. "Well, I guess it's all over but the shopping, then, isn't it?" he said.

"Yes," said Ernst. "Until tomorrow, then." He bowed to Elizabeth, shook hands with Stanley, and walked away. His boots made a heavy clumping noise as he went.

The next morning when they went dow for breakfast, Stanley was wearing a wool shirt, a sweater, a jacket he used for drivin and khaki trousers. Elizabeth had on wool slacks, a cotton shirt and a sweater, and scarf around her neck. Stanley had boug a rucksack, in which they put gloves, ex socks, two extra sweaters and their cran pons. As they walked into the dining roo their boots thundered on the floor, and Sta ley was glad that no other guests were abou He felt vaguely self-conscious with all h equipment, and he was glad he had resisted last-minute temptation to buy an Alpine ha

Elizabeth was silent all through breakfas but Stanley felt a growing ebullience that w due in part, he knew, to his feeling of havir scored a small victory the evening before. B it was due also to the fact that he honestly fe exhilarated at the thought of climbing th mountain, which somehow did not seem s ominous in the morning light as it had at dusk The lower slopes appeared to be only a mile so away, and from there his eye travele quickly to the snow fields, and up the whit ridges to the peak. He didn't understand wh the trip could not be made in one day, b then, he supposed that Ernst knew what h was talking about. He probably allowed tw days just in case a climber broke a leg, o something like that.

Stanley looked at Elizabeth. "I wonder we should bring any first-aid equipme along," he said.

She put down her coffee cup and stared him. "Why?" she asked. "What for?"

"Oh, nothing," he said cheerily. "It ju crossed my mind. But I imagine Ernst will h all stocked up on that kind of stuff."

She took a sip of her coffee, then set the cu down and wiped her mouth. "Yes," she sai "I imagine he will be."

Ernst arrived promptly at six, and greete them cheerfully. He was dressed as he ha the day before, and he also carried a ng rucksack, a small pickax and a neatly l mass of sleek, tough rope. He looked ly and without comment at their equip- , and then said, "Are you all ready?"

'arin' to go," Stanley said jovially. "You he way, and we're with you."

smile flickered on Ernst's mouth, and he "Good. This way, then."

nley shouldered his rucksack, and he and beth followed Ernst out the side door of otel. The morning air was cool, and there he smell of clover and wet grass, and the tain looked clean and white, as though ight had washed it and sharpened its out- They went down a path that crossed a -smelling field, and Stanley breathed y and stepped out in a long, swinging .

his feels good!" he said. "There's nothing valking in the early morning!"

lower," said Ernst, from behind him. must go much slower."

h," said Stanley, and he dropped back e Ernst, who was walking at no more casual stroll.

is is the mountain climber's pace," t said gently. "This way, you can walk all The other way, you fall down after an . You must save your strength."

f course," Stanley said. "I guess I for- " He looked at Elizabeth, who was walk- quietly along the path, keeping her eyes erately averted from the mountain ahead em. "How goes it?" he asked her. "How ou feel?"

e smiled thinly. "Oh, I feel fine," she said. st-rate."

r about two hours they walked across and meadows, and t told them about the try and the people. He not garrulous, and he e usually in answer to estion, but his answers complete almost to oint of eloquence. The he talked, the way he ed and the way he ed all suggested re- d contentment, and Stanley felt a great e of envy come over him. This, he thought, ie way to live—free, uncomplicated and y.

nally they came to a glacier at the foot of mountain, and they walked carefully up across its dirty, boulder-strewn surface. walking here was harder, and Stanley be- to perspire with the exercise. The sun was and after a while he took off his jacket put it in his rucksack. When they reached cky path that led from the glacier up the ntain proper, they stopped for a rest, and abeth took off her sweater and handed it tanley. She was warm, and her face glowed tly, but she did not seem to be out of th. "Here," she said, as she gave him the ater. "Could you put this in your pack?"

Sure thing," he said. His rucksack was here near as large or as full as Ernst's, but could already feel the marks of the straps his shoulders. He could also feel a slight tening in his chest. "As a matter of fact, I 't think I need my sweater either," he said. guess I overdressed for this part of the ." He put his sweater and Elizabeth's in the ksack, then took a deep breath and tched his shoulders backward. "Boy, this he life!" he said to her. "This is the best you ever had."

he looked at him coldly, and said nothing.

e had a cigarette, and then they started wly up the path again, and for what seemed endless hours they trudged up the side of mountain, back and forth as the path cut ough the most accessible places. They could nothing above them except rocks and ss and a few shrubs; behind them the vil- e dwindled into the distance, and off to ir right rose the sparkling peaks of the reckhorn, the Finsteraarhorn and the gfrau. The path was dry and dusty, and sun beat hotly on their backs, and Stanley that his face was on fire and his mouth s turning to leather. Once, when they pped for a breather by a small stream, he down and cupped his hands in the icy wa- ter, but before he could get any of it to his mouth, Ernst stopped him.

"No!" Ernst said sharply. "Never do that! It will make you sick."

"Oh," said Stanley. He stared at the stream for a moment, tortured by the sight of the racing, bubbling water, and then he wet his hands again and splashed his face. Then he sat up and looked at Elizabeth, whose face was shining with perspiration. "You want to try some?" he asked. "You look kind of warm."

"No, thanks," she said. "I'm fine."

"Madame is right," Ernst said, smiling. "Too much cold is no good when you're hot."

Well, it felt pretty good to me, Stanley thought. Too much cold or not, it felt better than anything has all day.

"What you need is something hot," said Ernst. "When we get to the cabin, I'll make you some hot tea."

Oh, great, Stanley thought. Hot tea, and sandpaper toast. That's all I need right now.

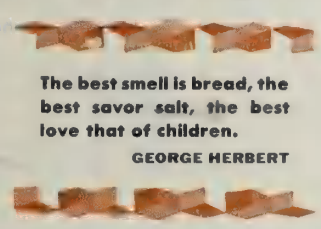
They had a little lunch, and then went on, slowly, endlessly, painfully, up the dusty, rocky path. There was no wind, and the afternoon sun grew hotter and still hotter. Stanley found that he was no longer looking around him; his eyes were fixed on the path at Ernst's feet, and the slow, clumping motion of the dusty boots had a hypnotic effect on him. He could see the stitches along both sides of the heel straps, rows of little white dots in the gray-brown leather, little white dots that flicked away and back, away and back, away and back. His own breath came and went in the same rhythm, in and out, away and back, and his heart pounded heavily in his ears. Ernst stopped, and Stanley almost ran into him.

"See?" Ernst said, pointing upward. "There's the cabin."

Stanley looked, and on what appeared to be a ledge high above them he saw the jutting underside of a cabin roof. He turned back to Elizabeth. "The cabin," he said. "We're as good as there."



"So soon?" said Elizabeth. Her face was light purple, and glistening, and her eyes looked unnaturally white.

They were not, however, as good as there. It was almost another hour before they reached the cabin, because the path wound back and forth across the side of the mountain, getting very little higher with each tack. The cabin loomed above them, tantalizing them and luring them on, but never seeming to get any closer. Then finally, when Stanley had sworn to himself that he would take fifty more steps and then lie down in the middle of the path, they rounded a turn and saw that only twenty yards of rocky ground separated them from the cabin. They tottered over the stones, and the moment they got inside the bleak, smoke-smelling room, Stanley and Elizabeth fell face first onto long wooden benches, unable to move or to speak. Ernst unlaced their shoes and took them off their feet, and replaced the shoes with large, wooden fleece-lined sabots, which felt good and curiously tender. Then he started a fire in the stove, and put on a large teakettle, in which he brewed tea to a dark, red-brown color. In each mug of tea he put four teaspoons of sugar, and then he set the mugs in front of them, and the kettle and the sugar nearby, and went out the door. The smell of the tea roused Stanley from his stupor, and with trembling hands he lifted the mug to his mouth and took a sip. It tasted good, and he took another, and by the time he had finished the mug he had found the strength to reach out and refill it. Elizabeth, on her bench, was also sipping her tea. When he had finished eight mugfuls, Stanley felt well enough to talk. He inched around so that he was lying on his back, folded his hands across his stomach, and looked up at the smoky ceiling and took a deep breath.

"Well!" he said. "I'll bet that was more exercise than George Walters gets in a year."

There was a bump as Elizabeth set down her mug. "Oh, shut up," she said.

After a while, as his strength returned still more, Stanley stood up and went over to the

The best smell is bread, the best savor salt, the best love that of children.

GEORGE HERBERT

UNIVERSAL

Coffeematic

with the FLAVOR-SELECTOR

If you're longing for real coffee with that satisfying aroma and full-bodied flavor, you need a Universal Coffeematic! Only Coffeematic makes perfect coffee to your taste time after time. Just set it and forget it. Coffeematic brews to perfection, signals when ready and keeps coffee at serving temperature without increasing the strength. Enjoy the finest coffee you ever tasted, get a new Universal Coffeematic today!

Deluxe ten-cup model
Chrome on solid copper $29.95
Others, $14.95 to $32.95

UNIVERSAL

LANDERS, FRARY & CLARK, NEW BRITAIN, CONN.

Dr. Scholl's SHOES

so kind to troubled feet

Sizes, Some Styles
2½ to 13
AAAAA to EEEEEEEE

So engagingly trim, too!

You'll quickly discover what real walking ease is like when you step out in your first pair of supremely comfortable, foot-flattering Dr. Scholl's Shoes. Made over Dr. Scholl's scientifically designed lasts, their glove-like, foot-cradling fit makes them ever so kind to your feet. No "breaking-in" discomfort.

Dr. Scholl's Shoes are made in all sizes for all types of feet. Expertly fitted at Dr. Scholl's Foot Comfort* Shops in principal cities and selected Shoe and Department Stores. If not obtainable locally, write for catalog to Dr. Scholl's, Inc., Dept. J58, Chicago 10, Illinois

MONEY...
In Your Spare Time
Spare-time income can help you meet expenses. Write for details about our subscription-selling plan. No obligation.
CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
331 Independence Square, Phila. 5, Penna.

CULOTTES do all the work!
3.99

Perfect fashion for puttering around the garden or patio. Sailor collar adds youthful dash. Fully cut culotte has the look of a dress, the ease of pants. Washes beautifully, wash and wear finish, needs no ironing, unconditionally guaranteed. Sizes 12-20, 14½-24½. Red, navy or charcoal striped cotton. (add 35¢ postage)

PENNY WISE
Dept. LH-5
95 Fifth Ave.,
New York 3, N. Y.

Out thunder horse and rider—and you're there for the fun of it! This summer, see roaring Black Hills rodeos, ride mountain trails where Hickok rode. Golf, swim, sightsee, fish in the Black Hills of South Dakota, 6,000,000 acres of mountain beauty.

Send for folder

SOUTH DAKOTA DEPT. of HIGHWAYS
H. U. Dixon, Pub. Dir., Pierre, S. Dak.

window and looked out. Near the cabin there was nothing but loose boulders and outcroppings of bare rock, but farther up were patches of snow, and then, as high up as he could see, the brilliant white expanse that marked the snow fields near the peak. The peak itself was out of sight.

The door opened, and Ernst came in. He was smiling his crooked-toothed smile, and in his massive fingers was a tiny gray flower. He took off his hat and gave the flower to Elizabeth. "For madame," he said. "An edelweiss."

"Why, thank you," Elizabeth said, with the first pleasure she had shown all day. "How very sweet!" She put the edelweiss in a buttonhole of her shirt and stood up. "I'll wear it as a good-luck token," she said.

Ernst bowed slightly, then turned to Stanley. "Soon it will be time for supper," he said. "And then you and madame can sleep up there"—he pointed to a ladder that led up through a square hole in the ceiling—"and I will sleep down here."

"Isn't it a little early for supper?" Stanley asked, looking at his watch. It showed five minutes past four. "That tea kind of filled me up for the time being."

"We'll eat in an hour or so, perhaps," Ernst said. "But it should be early, because we get up again at three."

"At three in the morning?" Stanley said incredulously.

"Oh, yes. We have to get to the summit by eight, so that we can be down out of the snow again before the sun warms it. In the day, when the snow is warm, there are sometimes avalanches."

"I see," said Stanley, after a pause. "Well, you make supper whenever you think we ought to have it, then."

They ate early, and then Stanley and Elizabeth climbed the ladder into the murky loft above. There was a line of straw mattresses on the floor, and they covered two of them with blankets that Ernst had given them, then wrapped more blankets around themselves, and lay down. Stanley was asleep almost immediately, but he awoke some time later and heard Elizabeth tossing and moaning in the darkness beside him. She twitched, and ground her teeth, and muttered incoherently, and when he reached out and touched her shoulder, she cried "No, no, no!" and sat up quickly. Then she sighed, and lay back again, and was quiet, with only her feet twitching every now and then. It seemed to Stanley that he lay awake for a long time, staring into the darkness, and then suddenly a flashlight was shining on him, and someone was touching his arm. Ernst's voice said, "Time to get up, Mr. Stanley," and when Stanley grunted in reply, there was the sound of Ernst's boots descending the ladder and clumping across the floor below. Stanley sat up, and reached out toward Elizabeth.

"It's all right," she said. "I'm awake."

They had a hot breakfast by the light of a large kerosene lantern, and then, under Ernst's supervision, they began to put on their heavy clothing. Elizabeth did not eat much breakfast; she was tight-lipped and silent, and as Stanley watched her he saw in her eyes the lack of focus, the deep concentration to bury panic, that he had seen in the eyes of men the first time they went on a patrol. She appeared natural in everything she did, but her mind was completely separated from her body. He tried to catch her eye and smile at her, or do something that might relax her just a little, but she was moving mechanically and without any perception of anything around her.

When they were dressed, Ernst took a small folding lantern from his rucksack, opened it up, inserted a candle, and lighted it. Then he extinguished the kerosene lantern and opened the cabin door, and they stepped out into the night. It was cold, but the sky was clear, and directly overhead they could see stars. They followed the dancing light of Ernst's little lantern across the field of rocks and boulders, and finally, when the ground began to rise, Ernst stopped and set the lantern down.

"All right," he said. "Now we put on the ropes." He uncoiled his length of rope, and tied one end around Elizabeth's waist. Then he tied it around Stanley's waist, and then around his own. "Now," he said to Stanley, "make a coil like this"—he took in three or four loops of slack line—"and hold that in your hand. That way, if madame should fall, you could let out the slack and brace yourself before the line goes tight. I do the same in case you should fall. Do you understand?"

"Yes," said Stanley, and he clutched the coil of line in his hand.

They trudged on upward through the darkness, and gradually the deep blue-black of the night began to change to a dark gray, and some of the larger rocks and crags became visible. Then there were patches of lighter gray, and they felt the occasional crunch of snow beneath their feet. Ernst's lantern sprinkled light ahead of them, but Stanley found that he was able to see fairly well without it. Then the sky began to lighten from gray to blue, and suddenly the white peaks around them took on a faint glow. Ernst stopped, blew out the lantern, and folded it and put it in his rucksack. Then he took his crampons and strapped them to his boots, and when Stanley and Elizabeth had done the same, he inspected them to make sure they were tight. "Good," he said. "Now we must be a little careful."

The ascent became steeper, and snow and ice lay more thickly among the rocks. Wearing the crampons, it was comparatively easy to walk on the snow, but Ernst guided them along rocky ridges, on which Stanley stumbled several times, and once he almost fell down. He looked at Elizabeth and smiled, and she smiled quickly and without expression.

By the time they reached the snow fields, it was bright daylight, and they had to put on their dark glasses. Everything around them was a dazzling white, and even through the glasses they felt an instinctive desire to squint. They climbed even more slowly, taking frequent rests. Once Stanley looked at his watch, thinking that it must be about noon, and saw that it was not quite seven. It seemed to him that he had been climbing for most of his adult life.

THE HEART FLIES HOME

By JESSE STUART

Though you are there tonight and I am here
You must not doubt my heart does not fly home
To you when autumn leaves are brown and sere
And stars are bright as honey in the comb.
Designs of leaves are in the dress you wear
As you walk where the autumn leaves jump down
From tall treetops into your autumn hair.
There sere leaves fall until earth wears a gown.
After a walk you sit before the fire Feeling the cheerful heat from oak and pine.
Reading a book till midnight,
then retire
To a clean, cool bed in a home
that's yours and mine.
If wheels will roll on rails of shining steel
And wings will climb up mountains of bright wind, Soon I shall be with you where we can feel
The time is now and leave the past behind.

Finally, at the end of an interminat stretch of slow-motion climbing, they reach a small plateau just below the summit, a they stopped to rest. They sat on a ledge snow and looked across at the Schreckhor which, although about four miles awa looked as though they could almost touch To their right, the plateau ran for a hundr yards or so, and then the summit of the We terhorn jutted straight into the air, like a ste ple of glistening ice. Surely he isn't going take us up that, Stanley thought. There isn room for one person on top of it, much less thre This is probably as high as we go, right her And that's all right with me too. As of this ve minute, I've had enough climbing to last me f a long time.

Ernst stood up. "All right," he said. "On t the top."

Stanley looked at Elizabeth, and saw tha she was no longer tense, as she had been, bu seemed almost completely relaxed. Sh jumped up, and dusted the snow from he slacks, and smiled at him as they started th slow walk across the plateau. He had no ide what had brought about the change in he but he was glad it had happened. He ha enough to think about in himself, witho worrying about her. Although they walke very slowly, he found that he was breathing i deep gasps, and as an added problem he wa beginning to develop a blister on the heel o his right foot. He thought briefly of staying o the plateau and letting Ernst and Elizabeth g on to the top, but was disgusted with himse the minute he had had the thought.

When they reached the sides of the summi Ernst took his ax and cut a small niche in th ice, then one above it, and then he put or foot in the first niche, and a hand in the se ond, and cut a third, higher up. Stanley fo lowed him, with one of his hands always i the niche below Ernst's foot, and Elizabet followed Stanley in the same manner. Actu ally, it was easier than the other kind of climb ing, because they took a step only every min ute or so, and the rest of the time stood clutch ing the ice wall, hunching their shoulder against the shower of chips from Ernst's ax Once, when it seemed that they must be near the top, Stanley looked down, and all he could see was white, shining ice that dropped away into nothing several thousand feet below. He closed his eyes and clung to the wall, and for a moment he thought he was going to lose his balance and fall. Then the dizziness passed, and he opened his eyes, but he did not look down again. He stared at the crystals of ice in front of him, and at Ernst's shoe just above his face.

Then the shoe disappeared, and after a moment Stanley felt a tug on the line around his waist, and Ernst pulled him up over the rim of the summit and shook his hand. Stanley sat down while Ernst lifted Elizabeth up and shook her by the hand, and then they all three crouched in the biting wind, on the small rounded peak, and looked out at the world below them. As far as they could see, and in all directions, were row after row of white rocky mountains, their shapes softened by distance but their brightness always constant. They looked like the surface of a stormy sea, with the lines of white breakers churning against one another. Directly below, and so close it seemed to be almost at their feet, was a small cluster of houses that was Grindelwald and beyond that, in the far distance, were the lakes of Interlaken.

Elizabeth gasped, and then was quiet while she looked all around. Even through snow glasses, Stanley could see that her eyes were bright, and her mouth was half open in a smile of wonder. "It's the most incredible thing I've ever seen in all my life," she said at last. "Just look, darling! Look!"

"I know," he replied. "It's something, all right."

"Something?" she said. "*Some*thing? It's everything!"

"O.K., everything," he said. "Whatever you say."

"But aren't you impressed? Don't you think it's breath-taking?"

"Of course! I think it's wonderful."

Elizabeth gasped again, and then was quiet.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 162

SCHOOLS, COLLEGES AND CAMPS

THESE ADVERTISERS WILL BE GLAD TO SEND BULLETINS AND ARRANGE PERSONAL INTERVIEWS. IN WRITING, MENTION YOUR REQUIREMENTS.

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, 555 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, NEW YORK

Girls' Camp

orge Camp For Girls 6–17. On Beautiful Lake George, Glen-Mile-long private shore. All water sports. 95-d campsite. Little theatre—professional staff. y, tennis, arts, crafts. 3 age groups. Resident r camp—Adirondack for Boys—nearby. nn E. Donat, 15 Walnut Hill Rd., Orange, Conn.

Girls' Schools

ent Place

Since 1894 a school of distinctive purpose—to graduate alert, poised girls, well-trained in every respect for college life. Spacious dorm on extensive campus 20 miles from NYC—country and cosmopolitan living. Music, art, dramatics, sports, riding, all activities. Catalog.
Miss Florence A. Wolfe, B.A., M.A., Headmistress ill

rep school. 192-acre campus "a little north lso Junior College. A. A. or A. S. degree in 2 transfer or specialized career courses. Mod-ls. Swimming pool, riding, golf on campus.
G. Frantz, Pres., Box W, Chambersburg, Pa.

E. Ellis School Girls, grades 6–12. MSA accredited.
ratory, art, music, home economics, secretar-sses. Individual guidance. 300-acre campus, buildings, suburban Phila. Separate dorms for Sports, riding. Gymnasium. Est. 1910. Catalog.
Look, Ph. D., Pres., Newtown Square 14, Pa.

ove A Friends' School for Girls. Emphasizes Preparation for College and Gra-seful Living. Music, Art, Speech. Grades ening interests of international enrollment. nded. Indoor ring. Winter Sports Featured lts. Beautiful new fireproof Quadrangle.
. Robert Owen, Box 128, Vassalboro, Maine

Ready School Girls. Grades 4-12. Resident and day.
reparation for college. Music, art, dramatics, retarial. Daily chapel, family life emphasized. cre campus. Modern buildings. Est. 1887.
Miss Evangeline Lewis, Headmistress, 6 Baltimore National Pike, Baltimore 29, Md.

School for Girls Accredited college preparation in ideal climate. Open air classes. Music, art, dra-etaryship. Character and personality devel-endly home life. Sports, riding. Endowed. llment. Catalog. Lucinda de L. Templin, rincipal, 4701 Austin Terrace, El Paso, Texas and. Girls 8–18. Established 1915. Accredited . Regents. College prep & general courses. Mu-nall friendly classes. Field trips. Full sports ding, tennis. Shore-front campus. 50 mi. N.Y.C. Sullivan, Headmistress, East Islip, L.I., N.Y.

School

Girls' School Switzerland

elainie St. Blaise, Neuchatel French Switzerland & Finishing school for girls 13–21. College aration in English, Languages, home econom-rial courses. Optional winter & summer at urs to Italy, France. Established 1880. Sum-June—September. Dr. A. L. Jobin, Principal

Special School

ining School at Vineland, N.J.
re in happiness for retarded & slow-learning boys 1 yrs. (min. 4-yr. social, mental level). Summer ne 30–Aug. 29. Cottage living. All therapies. l staff. Hospital, lake, pools, farm on 1600 acres.
Box L, The Training School at Vineland, N. J.

Dramatic Arts

an Academy matic Arts 74th Year. Thorough preparation for Stage, Screen, TV and Radio. In Senior Year public es on B'way. 2 yr. day courses approved for erans. Part-time evening courses. Saturday Teen mmer Sch. Rm. 195, 245 West 52nd St., N.Y. 19.

Business & Secretarial

rian College Coeducational. Est. 1863. Small classes. Work-. College life; social, athletic activities. In resi-a. Earn B.B.A. degree in 2 yrs., 8 mos. in , General Business, Sales Management. A.A. in medical, legal, secretarial; court reporting. G.I. Catalog. Registrar J, Milwaukee 10, Wisconsin.

ler School For women. Professional secretarial training combined ntages of living-in-Boston available to H. S. 2-yr. Medical, Legal, Executive courses. 1-yr. ee. Resident facilities with cultural, social pro-ranklin Square House. Write for catalog.
hrbough, Pres., 440 Beacon St., Boston 15, Mass.

College B.S. degree in 2 or 3 yrs. Professional training for business lead-usiness Administration: Acctg., Management, , Exec. Secretarial; Admin., Legal, Acctg., Med. Teacher-Ed.: 4 yrs. 1-yr. Sec'l Diploma. Coed. dorms. Vet appr. 95th yr. Sept., Feb. entrance.
Ruth West, Bryant College, Providence 6, R. I.

ine Gibbs Secretarial. Outstanding training. Three practical courses: One-Year , Liberal Arts-Secretarial (two years), Special College Women. Residences. For catalog write: s Dean, Boston 16, 21 Marlborough St.; New 30 Park Ave., Montclair, N.J., 33 Plymouth St.; 6, 155 Angell St.

ORTHAND IN 6 WEEKS
EEDWRITING shorthand. 120 words No symbols: no machines. Uses est to learn, write, transcribe. Lowest 350,000 graduates. Typing available. Write for FREE booklet to eedwriting® Dept. 9905-8 W. 42 St., N. Y. 36

Boys' Camps

Farragut Naval Camps
Summer of adventure on Toms River. Boys 8–18 in 3 age groups. Trips on 63-ft. flagship. 42 land and water activities. Modern buildings. 2 gyms. 2 athletic fields. Approved summer school program available. Write for catalog.
Farragut Naval Camps, Box ABC, Toms River, New Jersey

Idlewild The Oldest Private Camp. 68th year. Lake Winnipesaukee, N. H. For boys.—3 divisions. 8 weeks $495. No extras. Riding. Sailing, canoe, mountain trips. Golf, riflery, archery, speedboat, water skiing, aquaplaning, music, tutoring. Mature staff. Doctor, nurse. Cabins. Booklet. Mr. and Mrs. L. D. Roys, 375 Otis Street, West Newton 65, Massachusetts

Coeducational School

The Arnold School Trains boys and girls, grades 5–12, for self-reliant living. Work, study, play program. Stress on fundamentals. Thorough college preparation; also general, agricultural courses. Guidance. Family atmosphere. 165 acres. Operating farm. Sports, hobbies for all. 27th year. Write for catalog.
Nathan H. Arnold, E. Pembroke, Mass.

College

Emerson College Specialization in radio, television, drama, speech, speech and hearing therapy within a broad liberal arts program. B.A., B.S., M.A., M.S. degrees. Coed. College owned theatre, radio station and completely up-to-date electronic TV production studio. Dormitories. 78th yr. Catalog.
Admissions Dean, 126 Beacon St., Boston 16, Mass.

Junior Colleges

Virginia Intermont Fully accredited Junior College for women. Liberal Arts and Career Courses. Music, Art, Drama, Radio, Journalism, 2-year Nursing, Home Economics, Physical Education, Retailing, Secretarial. Elevation 2000 feet. Sports, riding, gym, pool. Est. 1884. Inclusive rate $1250. Catalog. Dir. Adm., Intermont, Box 102, Bristol, Va.

Marjorie Webster Junior College
Accredited. 2-yr. terminal and transfer courses. A.A. degree. Lib. Arts; Phys. Ed.; Kindergarten; Secretarial; Med. Secretarial; Speech; Dramatics, Radio, TV; Music; Art; Merchandising. Pool, gym. Suburban Campus. Catalog.
Box H, Rock Creek Park Estates, Washington 12, D. C.

Averett College
For girls, fully accredited. Transfer, terminal. Liberal Arts. Pre-professional courses. Merchandising, home ec., secretarial, med. sec'l. Music, art, drama. Individual attention, small classes. Sports, pool, gym. Endowed. 99th yr. Catalog.
Curtis Bishop, President, 424 W. Main St., Danville, Va.

Fine & Applied Arts

American Academy of Art
Practical courses in Commercial & Fine Art. Faculty of international reputation. Story, Advertising & Fashion Illus.; Lettering, Layout, Painting. Placement Service. Vet approved. Coed. Summer term begins June 23. Frank H. Young, Dir., Dept. 958, 30 East Adams Street, Chicago 3, Ill.

Ray-Vogue Schools
Commercial Art, Photography, Interior Decoration, Dress Design. Fashion Merchandising with Modeling. Fashion Illustration. Coed. Attractive residence for girls. Enter 1st Mon. each mo. Write Registrar, Room 706. Specify course.
Ray-Vogue Schools, 750 N. Michigan Ave., Chicago 11

Medical Technology

College of Medical Technology
Medical Technician Training. Also X-Ray. Graduates in demand, excellent pay. Free nation-wide placement. Approved school. Dorms. Athletics. Coed. Courses 3 to 15 months. Write for Catalog L giving year of high school graduation. 1900 LaSalle Avenue, Minneapolis 3, Minnesota

Franklin School of Science & Arts
Nationally famous for thorough training in Medical Technology—12 months; X-Ray Technology—6 months; Medical Secretary—12 months. Top paying positions waiting. Coed. Free Placements. Approved. Founded 1919. Send for Catalog A. 251 S. 22nd St., Phila. 3, Pa.

Northwest Institute of Medical Laboratory Technique Founded 1918. M. D. Faculty. Courses to 12 mos. in clinical laboratory, X-ray and EKG. Free placement service. Coed classes start Jan., Apr., July, Oct. G. I. approved. Catalog.
3418 E. Lake Street, Minneapolis 6, Minn.

Home Study Schools

$ECRETARIAL TRAINING

If you are now in the business world, you have discovered that you must have "know-how" to advance and make more money. Why be satisfied with a routine office job when you can easily, by home study in your spare time, qualify for Stenographic or Secretarial career. We guide you step by step in Gregg Shorthand, Typing, English, Personality Development, Filing, Secretarial Accounting, and other subjects to help you qualify for an executive secretarial or stenographic position. Low cost—easy terms. Opportunities everywhere today. Send for FREE booklet, "LaSalle Stenographic-Secretarial Training." No obligation.

LASALLE Extension University • 417 So. Dearborn St.
A Correspondence Institution Dept. SS-145, Chicago 5, Ill.

HIGH SCHOOL at HOME

You can still finish High School—at home, in your spare time. No interference with job, or social life. Win more pay, a better job, social recognition. Take only the subjects you need. Complete lesson and answer service. Personalized instruction. Low cost. Diploma to graduates.

I.C.S. is oldest and largest (257 courses). Write today for 3 free books: (1) 36-page "How to Succeed," (2) sample lesson (Math), (3) Career Catalogue—indicate course desired.

INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS
SCRANTON 15, PENNA. DEPT. 39196D

Calvert School You can educate your child at home with famous Calvert School-At-Home Courses. Kindergarten—8th grade. Accredited. Easy-to-follow teaching manual; lessons, books, supplies. No experience needed. Guidance by Calvert teachers. Start any time. 52nd year. Catalog. Give age, school grade.
Calvert School, 855 E. Tuscany Rd., Baltimore 10, Md.

American School High School at home. Many finish in 2 years. Go as rapidly as your time and abilities permit. Prepares for college entrance exams. Standard H.S. texts supplied. Diploma awarded. Credit for H.S. subjects already completed. Single subjects if desired. Free Bulletin.
American School, Dept. H53, Drexel at 58th, Chicago 37

Boys' Schools

STAUNTON MILITARY ACADEMY

In Beautiful Shenandoah Valley. Thorough college preparation; fully accredited. Individual guidance. Band. All sports. 2 gyms. Pool. Fine health record. Fireproof buildings. Separate Junior School. Illus. Catalog write Supt. S.M.A. Box 15, Staunton, Va.
BASIC COURSE R.O.T.C. BY U. S. ARMY INSTRUCTORS. Founded 1860

McDonogh A leading preparatory school for boys. Grades 1–12. Accredited. Prepares for all colleges, service academies. Small classes. Individual guidance. Music. Dairy and animal husbandry. Semi-military. Sports. 80 horses; 2 gyms, indoor pool. 835-acre country campus near Baltimore. Est. 1873. Catalog.
Robert L. Lamborn, Ed. D., Box 117, McDonogh, Maryland

Massanutten Military Academy
59th yr. Accredited. New Dorm & classrooms. Small classes. College Preparatory. Supervised study. ROTC. Band, Rifle team, Riding, Tennis, Football, Basketball, Baseball. Athletics for all. Gym, Pool. Grades 6–12. Catalog. Col. R. J. Benchoff, Hdmr., Woodstock 4, Va. (Shenandoah Val.)

Gordon Military College
Accredited. Grades 8–12. Also two years college. ROTC trains for military or civilian leadership. Supervised study. Stimulating activities program. 350 acres. Golf, all sports, pool. $995 inclusive rate. Founded 1852. Catalog.
Col. C. L. Harris, President, Barnesville, Georgia

Hargrave Military Academy Fully accredited. College preparatory, general courses. Grades 5–12. How-to-study training; remedial reading; individual guidance. Wholesome Christian influence. Separate Junior School. All sports. Summer School. Founded 1909. Catalog:
Col. Joseph H. Cosby, Pres., Box L, Chatham, Virginia

Admiral Farragut Academy
Fully accredited college preparatory. Toms River, New Jersey; St. Petersburg, Florida. Naval training. Separate Junior Schools. Testing, guidance for college and career. Sports, boats; bands. Summer camp and school. Catalog.
Adm. Farragut Academy, Box AB, Toms River, New Jersey

Manlius
Founded 1869. For boys. Accredited. Grades 7–12. Complete college preparation. ROTC. Highest U.S. Army rating for over 50 years. 126-acre campus. Remedial reading. Sports. Band. Summer session. Tutorial assistance. Catalog.
Robert A. Weekes, The Manlius School, Manlius, N.Y.

Bordentown Military Institute
Fully accredited. College preparatory and general courses. Aviation. Outstanding record of college entrance. ROTC. Boys taught how to study; small classes; individual attention. All sports. Junior School. 77th yr. Summer session. Write for catalog. Registrar, Box 405, Bordentown, N. J.

The Miller School of Albemarle
Military. Grades 5–12. College preparatory plus industrial arts, iron & wood working, auto mechanics, machine shop & electricity. Endowed. Inclusive rate $1200. Sports. New gym. 1500 acres. Near Charlottesville. 80th year. Catalog.
Col. W. Hugh Flannagan, Dept. L, Miller School P.O., Va.

Miami MilitaryAcademy Develops leadership and character. Fully accredited. College preparatory high school, Junior School. Small classes. Boys learn to study. National Defense Cadet Corps Honor School. Sports, sailing; pool. 35 acres on Biscayne Bay. Moderate fee. 33rd year. Catalog.
Col. F. R. Williams, 10603 Biscayne Blvd., Miami 38, Fla.

FORK UNION MILITARY ACADEMY

★ Our ONE SUBJECT PLAN of study in Upper School (grades 9–12) has increased honor roll 50%. Develops concentration. Fully accredited. ROTC highest rating. 17 modern buildings, 2 completely equipped gyms, 2 indoor pools. Splendid environment, excellent health record. Junior School (grades 4–8) has separate buildings, gym, pool. Housemothers. 60th year. For ONE SUBJECT PLAN booklet and catalog write:
Dr. J. C. Wicker, Box 865, Fork Union, Va.
★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Fishburne Military School
A distinguished military school for the young man seriously concerned with making adequate preparation for college entrance. Accredited since 1897. Grades 9–12. Highest ROTC rating. Summer School. Write for catalog.
Colonel E. P. Childs, Jr., Box E, Waynesboro, Virginia

Augusta Military Academy
"The Friendly School." Distinguished ROTC school in Shenandoah Valley. Jr. & Sr. Divisions. Boys 8–20. Accredited; graduates in leading colleges. All sports—pool, gym. 1400 acres. Family owned since 1742. Rate $1200. Catalog. Col. Charles S. Roller, Box J, Ft. Defiance, Va.

The Sewanee Military Academy
Division Univ. of the South. Fully accredited. Grades 8–12. Small classes. Individual attention. Boys Taught to Study. ROTC Highest Rating. All sports; gym, indoor pool. 10,000-acre mountain domain. Episcopal. 91st year. Catalog.
Col. Craig Alderman, Supt., Box L, Sewanee, Tennessee

Randolph-Macon Academy Military. Accredited. 67th yr. Near Skyline Drive. Prepares for college through intensive study methods. Fireproof dormitory includes class rooms, swimming pool. Superior equipment. 70 miles from Washington, D.C. Write for catalog and "Your Boy."
Col. John C. Boggs, President, Box H, Front Royal, Va.

Tennessee Military Institute
Boys planning to attend engineering schools and leading colleges need thorough preparation. T.M.I. provides that foundation. Over 90% of graduates enter colleges. Grades 8–12. Small classes. Summer School. 85th year. Catalog.
Colonel C. R. Endsley, Jr., Pres., Box 810, Sweetwater, Tenn.

PEEKSKILL ★★★

meets today's educational challenge

125th year marks intensified ACADEMIC PREPAREDNESS program for students of good or above average ability to advance to higher levels in Fundamentals including Mathematics, Sciences, and Foreign Language. This program which begins at 7th grade, also permits capable, interested students to enter at 8th, 9th and 10th grade levels (11th and 12th filled).

Boys learn to study through small classes and interested men teachers. Students advance in each subject according to their ability under flexible grouping—increases interest.

Military training develops leadership and systematic habits of study and play. All Sports with expert coaching. Rifle team, Band, Glee Club, Social Life. Modern brick buildings, Swimming Pool, Gym.

Superior achievement records in College and Life. For catalog and "Why Fundamentals Early," write Box 405, Peekskill Military Academy, Peekskill-on-Hudson 4, N. Y. Tel. 7-4520

Carteret School
Superior College prep. Accredited. 1st Grade to College. Small classes. Proper study habits. Reading Techniques. Shops. Homelike dormitory. Large gym. 40 acres atop Orange Mt. Moderate rate. New York trips 20 miles. Request booklet E-16. Carteret School, West Orange, N.J.

Milford College Preparatory School for Boys. Famous for its teaching since 1916. Grades 8–12. Homogeneous grouping in small classes helps develop good study habits, assures maximum achievement. Full athletic program and extra-curricular activities. Music. Spacious campus. Summer session July 7. Catalog.
William D. Pearson, Headmaster, Milford 12, Connecticut

Worcester Academy Boys prepared for increasingly difficult college entrance exams. Graduates in engineering, scientific schools. Grades 8–12. Preference given younger boys college pressure requires thorough prep. Only few 1-yr. boys accepted. Nat'l. enrlmt. Est. 1834. Sports. Headmaster, William S. Piper, Jr., 105 Providence St., Worcester, Mass.

Cheshire Academy Junior School. Grades 6 to 8. Thorough grounding in subjects anticipating college preparatory study on same campus. Emphasis on fundamentals. Flexible program for each boy develops good habits of concentration. Separate classes, dormitories, activities. Remedial instruction. Arthur J. Sheriff, Headmaster, Cheshire, Connecticut

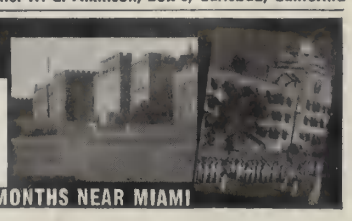
Morgan Park Military Academy
Superior academic program under inspiring faculty. College preparatory, fully accredited. Small classes, grades 4–12. Honor ROTC; Rifle Team, Flying, Swimming, Band, Art, Music, Drama. Shop. Sports; teams for all. 86th yr. Catalog.
Supt., Box 1058, Morgan Park, Chicago 43, Illinois

Western Military Academy
Develops a desire to succeed. Emphasis on self-confidence, self-direction, how-to-study. Small classes, guidance. Grades 7–12. Career analysis. Jr.-Sr. R.O.T.C. All athletics: riding, pool. 80th yr. Near St. Louis. Catalog:
Col. Ralph B. Jackson, Supt., Box L-5, Alton, Illinois

St. John's Military Academy Where boys become self-confident men. Accredited college preparation under the famous St. John's System. Grades 7–12. Inspired teaching. Small classes, individual attention. Reading Clinic. ROTC. Fireproof dorms. All sports. Summer Camp. 74th year. Catalog: Dir. of Admissions, Box 358, Delafield, Wis.

Missouri Military Academy And Separate Junior School. 70th yr. Grades 5–12. Fully accredited. Sr. ROTC. Friendly, inspiring teachers. Essentially college prep. Small classes. Strong guidance program. All sports. 30-acre lake. 5 athletic fields. 226-acre campus. Catalog.
Col. C. R. Stribling, 978 Main St., Mexico, Mo.

Wentworth Military Academy
Thousands of business and professional leaders started here. 4-yr. High School; separate 2-yr. College. Accred. Sr. ROTC. CAA flying. Modern bldgs., country club. Sports for all; pool. Summer school; also younger boys' camp. 79th yr. Catalog.
Col. J. M. Sellers, 1858 Washington Place, Lexington, Mo.



Kemper Military School
Rounded educational, military, recreational program. Century-old tradition; modern methods. Accredited. Small classes; personal guidance. 8th Grade, H.S. and Jr. College. Approved ROTC. All sports, pool; flying. 114th yr. Catalog. Dir. of Admissions, 1658 Third St., Boonville, Mo.

Howe Military School
Academic training in spiritual environment. Accredited preparatory, business. Potential Achievement Rating gives individual goal. Jr. school. Sr. ROTC. Sports. New dorms and pool. Episcopal. Est. 1884. Summer Camp. Catalog.
Burrett B. Bouton, M.A., 1758 Academy Place, Howe, Ind.

Villanova Preparatory School
Boys' Residential Catholic High School. Est. 1924. College Preparatory. Fully Accredited. 9th to 12th Grades. 131 Acre Campus. Healthful Climate. Near Santa Barbara. All Sports. Fall Term Registration Now.
Augustinian Fathers, Route 2, Box 10, Ojai, California

Army and Navy Academy
One of the Nation's finest Preparatory Schools. Fully accredited. Located immediately on the ocean 80 miles south of Los Angeles. Camp Pacific—Summer Camp. Catalogues:
Colonel W. C. Atkinson, Box J, Carlsbad, California

RIVERSIDE MILITARY ACADEMY

Health and interest assured by Spring and Fall in Georgia mountains. Winter at Hollywood-by-the-Sea, Florida—two complete school plants, each with all facilities. Outdoor sports year round. Attendance from 35 states.

Fully accredited preparation for all colleges. Also Post Graduate Dept. Constant association with selected teachers who live and eat with cadets. Weekly reports. ROTC program. Progress GUARANTEED. Reasonable All-inclusive fee. Outstanding record. Athletics for all. Separate Junior High, grades 7–8. For illustrated catalog, address:

GENERAL SANDY BEAVER, Pres., Box 505-J, Gainesville 5, Georgia

6 MONTHS IN BLUE RIDGE MOUNTAINS • 3 WINTER MONTHS NEAR MIAMI

NOW he is like a tightly wrapped bud. But, petal by petal, you will help the future unfold in your child. Sobering idea, isn't it? Makes a thoughtful parent resolve to begin saving now for the richer future a good education can provide. And what better way to save than with U. S. Savings Bonds? Where nothing can harm that education fund. Where saved dollars earn 3¼% interest when Bonds are held to maturity. And where saving is surer—because you can buy Bonds regularly where you bank or automatically through the Payroll Savings Plan where you work. Why don't you start your Bond program today? Make life more secure for someone you love.

PUBLIC SERVICE ADVERTISING COUNCIL

The U. S. Government does not pay for this advertisement. It is donated by this publication in cooperation with the Advertising Council and the magazine publishers of America.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 160

After a couple of minutes, Ernst stood up. "All right," he said. "Time to start back."

"I never want to leave here," Elizabeth said, as she got to her feet. "I'd like to build a house here, and spend the rest of my life." She looked at Ernst. "Of course you'd always be welcome," she said. "Whenever you want to come."

Ernst laughed. "It would be an honor," he said. Then he took the rope that was around her waist, and held it tightly. "Now, it is different going down," he said. "Going down, we face out, away from the mountain."

Stanley watched Elizabeth obediently turn around and sit down, with her feet hanging over the edge. Then she slid down, and Ernst held the line tight until she found a foothold, and he paid it out slowly until she had descended a few feet. Then he beckoned to Stanley, and handed him the coil of line. Stanley sat on the edge, and felt his own line tighten, and he groped desperately for a step, trying not to look below him. I can't look down again, he thought. If I look down again, I'll fall. Then he felt his foot catch in a step, and Ernst lowered him slowly, but he could not find the next step. "Easy," Ernst's voice said from above. "Easy." Then he found the next step, and Ernst lowered him some more, and then he was able to lean against the ice and go down by himself, still not looking. Ernst must have sensed his problem, because the line around Stanley's waist remained tight.

When they reached the plateau, Stanley was able to relax a little, but the blister on his heel was beginning to bother him, and as he walked he experimented with different positions of his foot, to try to ease the friction. Elizabeth, on the other hand, was like a little girl going to a party. She was almost lightheaded with merriment, and she walked considerably faster than was comfortable for Stanley. He was completely unable to understand the change in her, and for some reason it annoyed him that she should be so gay while he was beginning to feel the effects of the climb. If she was going to be surly part of the time, she ought to be surly the whole time, he thought. She ought to make up her mind one way or the other—either she likes to climb mountains or she doesn't.

After they had been going down for about a half hour, a new discomfort appeared. Stanley found that, in making the steep descent, he was in fact pushing up with his legs, as though walking backward, and was using a completely new set of muscles. The fronts of his thighs, from his knees to his hips, began to ache, and then actively to pain him, and the cramps in his legs eventually blotted out the searing pain of the blister on his heel. He tried all different ways of walking, but none did any good, and ahead of him Elizabeth kept the line constantly taut, as she skipped along down the icy trail. Stanley ground his teeth and cursed, and tried to keep his balance. Once, going along a rocky ledge, he turned his ankle, staggered, and toppled to one side, but before he could fall there was a sharp jerk around his waist, and he was snapped back into a standing position. He looked behind him, and saw that Ernst had leaped like a goat onto a higher rock, set his feet wide apart, and was tugging on the line. Stanley smiled weakly, and Ernst relaxed, grinned, and came back onto the trail, coiling the slack in the line as he did.

They took off their crampons while still in the snow fields, and Elizabeth found that she could simulate skiing by running a short way down a slope, then bracing both feet, and sliding stiff-legged. The first time she did this she pulled Stanley off balance, and they both fell heavily in the snow. She came up laughing. "That was fun!" she said. "Let's do it again!"

"Listen, let's have some warning before you do that," Stanley snarled. "I could have hurt myself."

"Oh, poo, the snow is soft," she said. "Come on."

"It so happens that I've got a blister the size of an egg on my right foot," Stanley replied. "If you want to do it, go ahead, but y... me a favor if you'll untie yourself fir...

"We can untie now, anyway," Er... He took the line from around Stanley... and coiled the slack.

"Will you ski with me, then?" E... said to Ernst. "You haven't got a blis... have you?"

"No," Ernst said, and smiled. "I... with you." He started to untie the li... her waist, but she stopped him.

"Let's ski tied together," she said. "... we can play a kind of snap-the-whip."

"All right," said Ernst, and he an... beth ran down the slope, skidded, and ... back and forth for about twenty yard... Elizabeth fell, and pulled him down. ... watched sourly as they got up, laughi... went off again. Slowly and painfully he ... down the slope after them.

They had lunch in the cabin, and then ... down the rocky path toward Grin... Ernst had put a dressing on Stanley's h... the blister continued to hurt him, and ... grew more painful with every step. By t... they reached the glacier, he was totteri... cramps and fatigue, and he considered ... impossible that he walk for another two... The distance from the glacier to th... seemed to him to be greater than the en... up the mountain, and the only thing th... him moving was the fact that Ernst an... beth were walking along ahead of him... best of spirits and apparently obliviou... presence. I could lie down here and fain... they care, Stanley thought. I could e... and they probably ... miss me until they g... hotel. Well, I won't ... that favor. I'll keep ... them if I never walk ... step in my life. I'll ... with them, and I m... pass them, when we ... the final stretch. I'l... into a trot, and jog pa... Then I'll collapse. ... would be the best w... past them, and the ... and smile, and fall slowly to the g... bleeding.

Don't make a hero of your husband, because you're sure to find him out. Make a comrade of him. It's far safer and lasts longer.

PHILIP GIBBS

It was late afternoon when they reach... hotel, and Stanley felt that he was on th... of delirium. His face was burning hot, a... pain had spread from his legs through... whole body, but he managed to smile ... paid Ernst his fee, and then shook his ...

Ernst took off his hat, and bowed and ... Elizabeth's hand. "There is a dance in t... lage tonight," he said, as he straighten... "It would be a good thing if you cam... because that will keep your muscles fro... ting too stiff."

"Oh, I don't think I feel up to a d... Elizabeth said, and laughed. "But that ... telling us about it, anyway. We'll think ... it, and see how we feel."

They said good-by, and Ernst went ... down the path, and waved to them ... turned onto the main road. As they we... the hotel, Elizabeth said, "I think I'm ... to be stiff tomorrow, no matter what w...

Stanley made no reply, but pulled ... painfully up the stairs, filled a bathtu... hot water, then wrenched off his clothe... sank into the water and went to sleep.

His next conscious knowledge was ... was dark, and he was in bed, and Eli... was beside him. He tried to move, but ... muscle in his body was as painful as a ... burn. He groaned softly. "Are you aw... Elizabeth asked.

"Uh-huh," he replied.

"I want to confess something," she ... She paused, and then went on, "I have ... never in my life been as terrified as I was ... up that mountain. I was sure we were all ... to be killed."

"You certainly didn't show it," he ... gallantly.

"I couldn't, in front of you. You w... calm and brave, I'd have felt idiotic if I'... you. But you were all that kept me goi...

With a great effort, Stanley stretched ... hand and patted her shoulder. "Think n... of it," he said. "Any time you need m... call."

T 1958

PUBLIC LIBRARY

ies' lme

JOURNAL

June
1958 · 35c

The Magazine Women Believe In 100 BACHELORS

TELL WHY THE HAVEN'T MARRIED YET

FACE OF THE TIGER
CONDENSED IN THIS ISSUE
COMPLETE NOVEL

DIVORCED WIFE STILL LOVES
FORMER HUSBAND
WHAT TO DO?

GROWING UP TO BE KING CLOSE-UP OF

Floor is Armstrong Embossed Inlaid Linoleum, No. 5310

all flagstone's virtues—and something extra, too

No, it's not flagstone. It's one of the exciting designs in Armstrong Linoleum. As you can see, this floor has all the natural beauty of flagstone. It even has gently embossed mortar lines — an exclusive Armstrong feature which gives it a realistic three-dimensional effect. To the good looks of flagstone, this floor adds the famous easy-care virtues of Armstrong Linoleum. There are no dirt-catching cracks. This whole dining room floor has only two seams, and they're so tightly joined that not a speck of dust can hide between. Spilled things, even grease, won't stain Armstrong Linoleum. You just whisk them away with a damp mop. And because handsome designs like this one are built in, your dealer can put down this floor much faster than a custom design in tile. This is important to remember, because the less time it takes to install a floor, the less money you spend. This modern, fashionable floor offers you so many lovely styles and colors to choose from. Just think which rooms in your house would gain new beauty and practicality from a floor of Armstrong Linoleum.

SEND 25¢ FOR "SUCCESSFUL DECORATING," 32 pages full of ideas in color for every room. Description of this "Flagstone Dining Room," with list of furnishings, available free. Write Armstrong Cork Company, 5806 King Street, Lancaster, Pennsylvania.

Armstrong

THE MODERN FASHION IN

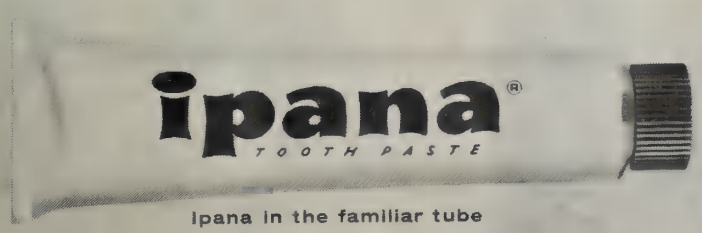
FLOORS

WATCH ARMSTRONG CIRCLE THEATRE, ALTERNATE WEDNESDAY NIGHTS, CBS-TV

NOT A WHISPER OF BAD BREATH

WITH NEW IPANA

...its distinct taste tells you so



- New Ipana® Tooth Paste with germ-killing WD-9 prevents bad breath. Use it regularly. Ipana's distinct taste and refreshing after-taste tell you it cleans your entire mouth.
- Ipana with WD-9 actually has twice the decay-germ killing power of any other leading tooth paste. So it can help your children fight tooth decay effectively, too.

NEW!

Try Ipana in the handy pressure can.

SPECIAL!
SAVE 10¢
~~Reg. 98¢~~ only 88¢ for a limited time only.

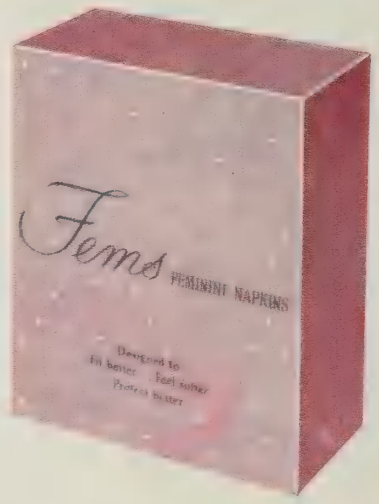
Fast, easy, efficient.
A light touch and out comes the right amount.



Ipana in the familiar tube

Ipana is another fine product of Bristol-Myers

Into your life for the first time come . . .

Fems

FEMININE NAPKINS

FEMS IS A TRADEMARK OF KIMBERLY-CLARK CORP.

For new comfort even when you're active

FEMS are a completely different kind of napki They were made to put more comfort into yo active, busy days.

FEMS fit better because they're longer napkir This means that they adjust to your body cor fortably. They're designed so as not to shift, pu or bind . . . to stay in place no matter how acti you are.

FEMS are delicately soft. Touch the chafe-fr covering to the inside of your wrist, where yo skin is extra sensitive, and you'll realize why FEM give welcome freedom from chafing, rubbing a other discomforts.

FEMS absorb quickly. Each part of this napk . . . covering, as well as inner material . . . is sp cially constructed to keep surfaces comfortab dry, even during the heaviest menstrual flow.

FEMS virtually stop stains from showing throug Their exclusive safety-cushion guards against b tom and side stains, whether you're sitting, wal ing or sleeping.

FEMS give you far more comfort and securi For new comfort even when you're active, swit to FEMS Feminine Napkins.

- You'll see the difference. FEMS' ext length means FEMS fasten easily, fit bett stay comfortably in place.
- You'll feel the difference. FEMS' chafe-fr covering and exclusive safety-cushion gi you more comfort, more protection.

Ladies' Home Journal

CONTENTS

VOL. LXXV NO. 6

June, 1958

JOURNALITIES

Ursula Curtiss

URSULA CURTISS (Face of the Tiger, page 46) says: "My father was the cartoonist Paul Reilly; my mother is mystery novelist Helen Reilly. As I worked on a weekly newspaper and wrote advertising copy before my marriage (to a lieutenant colonel who was captured on Bataan, lived three and a half years in Japanese prison camps and still likes rice), it seemed strange not to be typing something, so I rented a typewriter and wrote a book. We now live in Abington, Massachusetts, with ten acres to accommodate our five children, aged ten years to ten months. The literary strain in our family is not dying out. I keep coming across pieces of paper, all identically inscribed by our eldest daughter, Katherine: 'One day there was a horse.' It could be a serial."

Glenn White

Eleven years ago this month a young man joined the JOURNAL staff. Formerly a schoolteacher, airport traffic controller and naval officer with many hundreds of hours in the air, he objected to being called "young" and other things. He no longer does. "I have mellowed," GLENN WHITE admits; "oh, how I have mellowed!" But it took numerous articles, many editors, several secretaries and much travel in every state in the Union and in fourteen foreign countries to do it. "I find now," he says, "that the most important people in my life are my wife, our two young sons, anybody else who can read, a pet mouse and myself—in that order." His latest effort is this month's How America Lives: Between Jobs (with Hugh Beaumont) on page 127.

Patricia Martin

PATRICIA MARTIN, of the JOURNAL staff, wrote 100 Men and the Girls (page 56) and she interviewed a hundred marriageable bachelors to do it. She says—"and you may quote me": "For many years I have pondered why some men are reluctant to marry, but finally do. At seven I roamed the neighborhood of a sandy-haired boy named Herbie, taking instant maidenly flight when I was sure he had seen me. He never bothered to follow. The experience paid off, though. Many bachelors later I met Gustav J. Martin, then as now wedded to science. He says he has never been sorry he took another wife. I don't know—science is a formidable rival." As for the hundred eligible males she met to write her article—"I'm sure some bright girl has changed the status of almost every one of them by now."

Condensed Novel Complete in This Issue

FACE OF THE TIGER, Ursula Curtiss . 46

Stories

CHILD LOST, Ethel Edison Gordon . 48

VLADIMIR, Louise Pfaffmann . 50

ICE PALACE (Conclusion), Edna Ferber . 58

Special Features

OH, PROFESSOR!, Dorothy Thompson . 11

EDUCATING TODAY'S CHILD FOR TODAY'S WORLD, Benjamin Spock, M.D. . 19

OLD WAYS YIELD TO THE NEW, Margaret Hickey . 39

GROWING UP TO BE KING, James Brough . 52

100 MEN AND THE GIRLS, Patricia Martin . 56

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?, Dorothy Cameron Disney . 68

HOW AMERICA LIVES: BETWEEN JOBS, Glenn Matthew White and Hugh Beaumont . 127

General Features

OUR READERS WRITE US . 4

UNDER COVER, Bernardine Kielty . 28

MAKING MARRIAGE WORK, Clifford R. Adams, Ph.D. . 32

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE, Harlan Miller . 36

REFERENCE LIBRARY . 42

FIFTY YEARS AGO • JOURNAL ABOUT TOWN . 45

ASK ANY WOMAN, Marcelene Cox . 77

THIS IS A SCRIBBLER, Munro Leaf . 140

Fashion and Beauty

HAVE A BEAUTIFUL SUMMER, Wilhela Cushman . 60

LOOK-ALIKE FASHIONS FOR SUMMER, Nora O'Leary . 64

BEAUTY WORKSHOP LESSONS IN MAKE-UP, Dawn Crowell Norman . 66

HOW TO DRESS WELL ON PRACTICALLY NOTHING!, Bet Hart . 92

A CHILD'S TERRY-CLOTH ROBE . 154

Food and Homemaking

COOK, FREEZE AND TREASURE . 70

LOW-CALORIE COLLECTOR'S ITEMS . 72

THE WELL-FED BRIDEGROOM, Margaret Williams . 103

JUST 5′ BY 5′—A PLUG-IN KITCHEN, Margaret Davidson . 110

FAMILY FAVORITES WITH A DIFFERENCE, Jane Engel . 138

Architecture, Gardening and Interior Decoration

CAPTAIN'S HOUSE ON MARTHA'S VINEYARD, Richard Pratt . 54

FOOLPROOF COLOR SCHEMES NO. 3, Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland . 69

WHAT DOES THE GARDENER DO IN SUMMER?, the Gardener's Assistant . 150

Poems

THE TACITURN TYPE, Philene Hammer . 78

FROZEN ASSETS, Georgie Starbuck Galbraith . 87

SUDDENLY IN SUMMER, Barbara Shook . 108

UNFORGOTTEN, Jesse Stuart . 125

ALWAYS ROOM FOR ONE MORE, Elizabeth Graham . 153

Cover Photograph by Richard Avedon

CHANGE OF ADDRESS

At least 30 days before a change is to take effect please send your complete name, new address and a mailing label from a recent issue. If this is not possible, write out your old address and send it with the new one, including zone number. Address the Ladies' Home Journal, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. The post office will not forward copies unless you provide necessary postage. Duplicate copies cannot be sent.

Ladies' Home Journal, © 1958 The Curtis Publishing Company in U.S. and Great Britain. All rights reserved. Title registered in U.S. Patent Office and foreign countries. Published on last Friday of month preceding date by The Curtis Publishing Company, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office at Philadelphia, Pa. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by Curtis Distributing Company, Ltd., Toronto, Ont., Canada.

The names of characters in all stories are fictitious. Any resemblance to living persons is a coincidence.

Subscription Prices U.S., U.S. Possessions and Canada—1 Yr., $3.50; 2 Yrs., $6; 3 Yrs., $8.50; 5 Yrs., $11. Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Republic of Honduras, Salvador, Spain and South America (except the Guianas)—1 Yr., $4. All other countries—1 Yr., $7. Remit by Money Order or Draft on a bank in the U. S. payable in U. S. Funds. All prices subject to change without notice.

Unconditional Guaranty. We agree upon request direct from subscribers to the Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications not previously mailed.

The Curtis Publishing Company. Robert E. MacNeal, President; Mary Curtis Zimbalist, Sr. Vice Pres.; Cary W. Bok, Sr. Vice Pres.; Benjamin Allen, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Circulation; Donald M. Hobart, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Research; Edward C. Von Tress, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Advertising; Brandon Barringer, Treasurer; Robert Gibbon, Secretary; Richard Ziesing, Jr., Vice Pres. and Advertising Director of Ladies' Home Journal. The Company also publishes The Saturday Evening Post, Jack and Jill, and Holiday.

Is your car burning up your child's college education?

by GEORGE ROMNEY

President, American Motors Corporation

EVERY YEAR, it costs more and more to send a child through college. Yet many families face the problem of educating not just one, but two or three children. Maybe you face this problem. How can you solve it?

Today, millions of families are burning the money they could use for higher education for their children . . . on big, gas-hungry, oversized cars. Good money goes up in smoke.

You Don't Have To Burn Your Money

Every month, thousands of parents find that they can save hundreds of dollars a year with Rambler.

Many Rambler families find that they can cut their overall car costs in half. Since most families spend at least 10% of income after taxes on automotive transportation . . . and some as much as 50% . . . Rambler savings can be considerable.

The Ideal Family Car

Rambler is the ideal family car. It not only gives the economy and handling ease of a European car, but is most roomy. A Rambler rides six big 6-footers in comfort.

Rambler is also ideal because it offers so many features helpful to parents. For instance, Reclining Seats. These can be made into "nap couches" for children when you're out shopping. Or made up into Twin Travel Beds for economical family tours. These are exclusive with Rambler.

Have Fun While You Save

It's fun to drive a Rambler. It's thrifty, too. You save when you buy . . . save on every mile you drive . . . and you come out ahead when you trade-in a Rambler.

Visit a Rambler dealer. See if you, too, can't put away hundreds of dollars a year now for future education . . . by driving a Rambler instead of a big, expensive gas-guzzler of a car.

George Romney

Today he's...Huckleberry Finn

Carter's knows how to outfit a young adventurer for dreaming. Gay prints, cool knits brighten the bedtime mood. No-iron, machine-washable cotton knits lighten the Mother work. And easy-action styling makes these pajamas a night-long comfort to wear. Carter-Set so won't shrink out of fit.

FOR BOYS: SWIMMING HOLE PRINT PAJAMA. Nevabind sleeves. Blue, red, yellow print. 4-12 years. Long pants, $2.50. Short pants, $2.25.

FOR GIRLS: SPRING SONG PRINT PAJAMA. Smocked front. Aqua, blue, pink print. 4-12 years. $2.50.

Carter's

THE WILLIAM CARTER CO. NEEDHAM HEIGHTS, MASS.

OUR READERS WRITE US

Note to Husbands

St. Louis, Missouri

Dear Sir: I think husbands are somewhat to blame for this "just a housewife" complex today. I've seen wives knock themselves out keeping up with small children, coping with constant interruptions, baking special cakes or pies, and running errands to the hardware store for hubby. Then when dear husband comes home and can't find his slippers where he left them (in the middle of the bedroom floor, no doubt), he explodes and demands to know what she's been doing all day—sleeping?!

Just how long would he tolerate this attitude toward his job before he got discouraged? Very sincerely,

JUDITH H. SLIFER

Like Mother, Like Daughters

Merion, Pennsylvania

Dear Editors: My earliest childhood memories include learning my letters from the JOURNAL's pages, and cutting out those lovely illustrations for scrapbooks. Now my own two sprouts are following in Quiet readers.

the same pattern. We wondered why they were so quiet during our dinner hour and when I slipped quietly into the living room to check on them, found this unposed shot waiting for me! Very sincerely,

JOY SHEARER

All Gabble and Gossip?

Mamaroneck, New York

Dear Editors: Is the art of conversation dead in this country? In most gatherings, the men cluster in one group and the women in another and hold forth in monologues on business, sport, cars, the latest gadget, children, servants, food and drink. I have been admonished not to discuss travel, books or any subject other than the above because people "think you are being high hat." Oh, how many long tales of personal aggrandizement or dogmatic prejudice one has to listen to in an evening!

My ideal of real conversation is an easy give and take of thought, not necessarily on a high intellectual plane. There does need to be a tolerance for ideas that differ from your own, a willingness to listen part of the time, and an effort to add something original to the discussion. The result should be stimulating! Yours,

JANE EVANS

Artful Mending

Hornell, New York

Dear Editors: As the mother of seven, I abhorred "catching up" little holes and patching areas of knee rips; but I loved fancy work, appliqué and embroidery.

Hence the solution came with a hole in the front of a new red T shirt. I took embroidery floss and darned the hole. But then I added embroidered pigtails, French-knot eyes and a red smiling mouth. Three holes in a turquoise sweat shirt next were converted into pink-centered daisies with white petals; for the boys' clothes I made baseballs, footballs, guns and Indians.

I can guarantee that artfully mended clothes will be the most worn in a child's wardrobe; and mother will have the satisfaction of making something humdrum a real pleasure! Sincerely,

JOAN LINDEMAN

Too English?

Boise, Idaho

Dear Sirs: Why must you have so much in your magazine that is English? We got rid of those people with the Revolutionary War, and I'm sick of reading about them.

Yours for more American stories,

MRS. J. K.

▶ We publish the best stories and articles we can buy, regardless of who writes them. But we do think Daphne du Maurier, Margery Sharp, Rumer Godden, Dorothy Black, P. G. Wodehouse, Rebecca West and others who happen to be English are exceptionally good novelists. Most of our readers who have written us agree. ED.

Mr. Perry Como is Not the Only One Who Gets Letters

Bryan, Texas

Dear Editors:
Nine years old writes letters
To addresses carefully copied
From TV programs,
From cereal boxes,
From magazines, and a wrapper from soap.
Nine years old is forever
Inquiring proper spelling,
Or hunting paper,
Or a pencil,
Or tasting a stamp or an envelope.
Nine years old believes that
A letter addressed this way
(With a hard lead):

GOODY-GOODIES
PO BOX 602
NEW YORK 50 NY

Will conquer rain,
Snow and sleet,
Fire and flood
(Not mentioning dim eyesight)
And having leaped the barrier
Of distance in one night,
Is safe in the hands
Of the powers that be,
Who, by morning, are giving Consideration to (with proper glee):

I LIKE GOODY-GOODIES
BECAUSE THEY TAST ~~SW~~ ~~YUMMY~~ GOOD!

Nine years old is confident
He stands a chance of winning
A trip to Europe,
Two yachts, and
Sixteen thousand
You know whats.
Nine years old believes it,
But he doesn't let it
Keep him from getting
His three squares, some snacks
And his regular nine at night.
He just believes in the good old
U. S. mails, that's all.

JESSIE MERLE FRANKLIN

For Those Young in Spirit

Portland, Oregon

Dear Editors: Why can't we have a national organization (something like the USO) for older people? It would provide companionship, entertainment, and could like getting the 4th cake free!

CONTINUED ON PAGE 6

America's favorite beauty soap is your best value today!

4 cakes of Personal Size Ivory cost about the same as 3 cakes of other leading toilet soaps

99 44/100% pure®...it floats

Ivory costs you less than other familiar toilet soaps (and far less than those expensive new bars)—yet there isn't a milder soap to be had at any price! Ivory Soap is so white, so pure—gentle enough for a baby's skin. By simply using Ivory regularly you save money, month after month, and have a lovelier complexion too. Smoother—fresher—clearer. You have That Ivory Look.

More doctors advise Ivory than any other soap

TAN, don't burn
USE
COPPERTONE

Only Coppertone gives you sure protection from the sun plus a rich, dramatic Coppertone tan.

Make the most of every moment in the sun this summer! Use Coppertone whenever you're working outdoors . . . taking part in sports . . . enjoying family fun in your own back yard . . . and, of course, when sunning at the beach or pool!

Only Coppertone gives you a special combination of lanolin, to help keep skin soft . . . cocoa butter, to encourage a smooth, beautiful tan . . . and homomenthyl salicylate, the magic ingredient that screens out harmful burning sun rays.

P.S. For babies and extra-sensitive skin—new Coppertone Shade!

DON'T BE A PALEFACE!

Florida's Famous COPPERTONE®

LOTION, OIL, CREAM, SPRAY, AND SHADE, LIPKOTE, NOSKOTE—ON SALE EVERYWHERE!

Also available in Canada

Copyright 1958, The Coppertone Corp.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 4

include an employment service for them too. Here in Portland we have several Golden Age clubs and a Senior Craftsmen organization which teaches crafts and has a store to market them. Given a place to meet, Golden Agers everywhere would surely be able to do everything else for themselves! Sincerely.

JOYCE M. PAHLKE

It Burns Me Up!

Cincinnati, Ohio

Dear Editors: Nowadays, most purveyors of dried and canned foods, instead of raising prices as costs go up, cut the size of their packages. For example, my Boston-baked-bean recipe calls for a pound of pea beans. These I can find in only 10-ounce packages. To avoid being left with 4 ounces of unused beans, I now buy beans in bulk. Is this what packagers want?

Frozen peas are now only 10 ounces too. I don't mind that—but I do resent some companies' continuing to say that 10 ounces will serve four people amply.

Yours for simpler living,

MRS. GEORGE GUEST

Career at Home

Garner, North Carolina

Dear Editors: I just finished making an apple pie. It's baking now and smells wonderful, and that's very satisfying. Because I'm a housewife, and I'm glad.

I used to complain a lot, as many women do. I wanted an exciting, glamorous job—any kind. Instead, I have a house to keep clean and two children to feed and a husband to get off to work in the mornings. And I've found some answers.

I'm isolated here—no transportation, nowhere to go. Sometimes I'd give anything to get away for a while. But on nasty days, I don't have to go out. On sunny days, the kids and I can stay outside and play together.

Theoretically, I do about $140 worth of work a week, with no tangible pay. But I can leave the beds unmade and read, if I want to, or study Sunday-school lessons or watch TV. And I don't have to compete or worry about my job. I have no vacation or sick leave, of course, but I do have people who try to make things easier when I need a rest.

As the children grow older, maybe someday I'll have a paying job. If I want to, I can finish college—starting now with correspondence courses. For the present, I'm getting the greatest possible return for my labor. And I'll get dividends the rest of my life. Most sincerely,

JUDY ROGERS

Suppose Johnny Does!

Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania

Dear Editors: Now that everybody has had his say about Why Johnny Can't Read, I suggest an alternate worry. For a great many Johnnys do learn to read, and then to write, and the combination eventually produces something known as homework. You do not notice it at first. It creeps up on you unawares, like measles, but the first thing you know the whole family is breaking out with it.

How simple it seemed, and sweet, when our John came home from second grade one day and asked for a picture of a robin. "Teacher told us Monday, but I forgot, and we have to have it tomorrow for our Book of Spring. Just any kind of picture of a robin."

Well, it was spring and almost any magazine might be bursting with robins. I gave him a stack of magazines. After supper I began to thumb with him. We found butterflies, tulips, baby lambs, horses plowing—no robins. None of these would do, he said, beginning to cry. Then he slowly added, "We are allowed to draw it if we can't find one."

I cannot draw, but by midnight I had found a blackbird which I traced and colored. The product was undoubtedly a bird, conceivably a robin.

When John came home from school next day, he was dejected. "Well," I admitted, "it did not look too much like a robin."

"Oh, it was a wonderful bird," said John. "But nobody else had one, and they all used mine to draw one. By the time it got back to me, the bell rang so it was too late. You see, it didn't count unless we drew it ourself."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 8

GOODBYE FLEAS

no more bother . . .
. . . no more fuss

FLEACOLLARS get rid of fleas simply and easily . . . save you trouble! No greasy ointments to smear on . . . no messy powders to dust. Simply tie a FLEACOLLAR around your pet's neck . . . starts to work at once and gives round-the-clock protection. Only 49¢ for dogs or cats . . . money-back guarantee!

"Always keep your pet socially acceptable"

Write for free booklet about fleas.

Ace FLEACOLLAR®

BOX 236-19 • ROCHESTER, NEW YORK

Make Your Summer More Enjoyable with this Aluminum Cooler!

THIS aluminum chest will hold a full case of beverages. Equipped with a bottle opener, a drain plug, and removable food tray it's ideal for picnic or traveling enjoyment.

To earn yours send us five 2-year Ladies' Home Journal subscriptions at $6 each, or three 2-year Saturday Evening Post subscriptions at $10 each. All subscriptions must be sold outside your home at the full advertised price. Both new and renewals count, but not your personal or personal gift subscriptions.

Write your order on plain paper and mail with your own name and address and full remittance to us. Offer good in continental U.S. only, until September 30, 1958. Sorry, no cooler chests may be sold for cash.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
352 Independence Square
Philadelphia 5 Pennsylvania

HOT, TENDER FEET?

Dr. Scholl's Foot Powder quickly relieves hot, tired, tender, perspiring, odorous feet. Eases new or tight shoes. Get a can today!

Dr Scholl's FOOT POWDER

"Eenie meenie miney mo," Men of action, and ladies know Canada Dry makes 9 delicious flavors.

Canada Dry Flavors are so easy to serve...just lift the cap and enjoy:

FIZZ — Only Canada Dry flavors have "Pin-Point Carbonation"— millions of tiny, sparkling bubbles to brighten the taste.

FLAVOR — A delectable variety of them, made from exclusive formulae, all with Canada Dry's luscious-tasting pure, pure water.

FUN — Refreshing Canada Dry quality perks-up tired dispositions. Natural, wholesome, enjoyable ingredients do the trick!

GOLDEN ANNIVERSARY
CANADA DRY CELEBRATION

Canada Dry fizzy flavors are fun to drink. Try some today!

2 great new ideas
IN DENTAL CARE
from Dr. West's

More protection in a single brushing than any other way

1 New Dr. West's Push-Button Tooth Paste The modern, convenient container says it's new . . . the tangy, refreshing flavor tells you something good is going on! New-textured Dr. West's paste flows smoothly and evenly without spurting. Penetrates tooth crevices for more thorough cleaning with polishing action. Here is the most modern dental care for your family . . . from Dr. West's! (NOTE: Take it on trips . . . travels safely with exclusive protective tip.) Special introductory price. 79¢

2 New Dr. West's "Germ-Fighter" Toothbrush More health protection than any toothbrush ever offered! You can use it even after you've had a bacterial infection. It can touch other people's toothbrushes. This amazing Dr. West's "Germ-Fighter" won't pass along germs. Every bristle is treated by a special anti-bacterial process*. This enables it to inhibit or destroy germs that fall on and hold to it. Cleans your teeth best, too, because it's shaped right to fit your dental arch. *Pats. applied for 69¢

Copr. 1958 by Weco Products Co.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 6

This incident gave me forebodings. With younger children coming on, I carefully began to collect robins and other pictures of spring. When Robert reached second grade I had four robins and two bluebirds. But Robert did not need them for his Book of Spring. He had to make a pussy-willow tree.

The older ones were needing pictures too. "Home Ec" had to have balanced meals and table settings; "Science" had to have reptiles, crustaceans, growing plants. Fifth grade needed illustrations for a trip around the world.

I began collecting in earnest. I could hardly wait until the family had read a new magazine before I was cutting out pictures and putting them in The Box. And pictures were not the only things. As a child advances, there are also reports. (Your school library may be well equipped, but something always detains children after school until the last reference book has been taken.)

There are two other reasons for The Box: if four of your children need pictures of different things from about fifty old magazines, The Box is easier. And, as you will discover, commercial artists and writers of magazine articles are all in a conspiracy against us. The year you need birds, the advertisements will all be in flowers. The year you need travel, they will all feature prehistoric animals. The years your children study Latin all the phrases will be in French.

But never mind. You too can fill a Box someday.

My advice is: Never turn away a magazine salesman. Take anything he offers, including nature, pictorial, travel, scientific, historical, political and miscellaneous types. You will also need every local newspaper and the New York Times. If you cannot afford this, maybe you can beat the Salvation Army collector to the homes of your friends. And keep everything. It is increasingly difficult for our Philip to ride his tricycle around the growing stacks of shreds, but next year he will go to school and he will use them too.

Now if you will excuse me, I will go and cut out a few pictures before dinner!

Sincerely,
MILDRED ELDRED ORR

Victims Should Not Suffer

Somewhere in California

Dear Editors: The laws of our land do little to protect or unburden women and girls who are pregnant due to rape. Abortion is illegal even if the man is the most depraved psychopath or feeble-minded fool. The girl is expected to bear the child, with all its father's bad genes and hereditary taints. I know, for my daughter was a victim.

Surely the law should be modified—slightly and cautiously, of course, but in a more humane direction? As a suggestion to the American Medical Association, let a panel of six qualified, ethical physicians judge each case on all available evidence and decide whether abortion or continuance of pregnancy is the better part of wisdom.

Sincerely,
A CONCERNED PARENT

Loans for Students

New Hope, Pennsylvania

Dear Sir: Education in the liberal arts, mathematics, science and leadership is essential for American survival. I suggest:

Without a means test of any sort, gifted individuals must be privileged to borrow, on character and without collateral, from either Federal or state governments, at least $2000 (1958 buying power) for each year in earning freely chosen college degrees.

These investments are to be amortized, with interest of 1 per cent, in ten annual installments, beginning about three years after achieving the final degree.

Term insurance will recoup losses and defaults. Should any borrower become totally disabled or die, no claims should obtain against him or his estate.

Selection of gifted persons should be made only by duly constituted local authorities.

Mortgages and installment buying are in accord with American business principles. Why not apply these methods to secure an education, which can never be lost?

Very respectfully,
WILLIAM RUSSELL WHITE
Rear Admiral, U. S. Navy, retired

Better than aspirin even with buffering for

TENSE NERVOUS HEADACHES

Nervous tension headaches need the special relief Anacin® gives. Here's why Anacin is better than aspirin, even with buffering added. Anacin is like a doctor's prescription. That is, Anacin contains not just one but a combination of medically proven ingredients. Anacin acts to (1) relieve pain, (2) calm nerves — leave you relaxed, (3) fight depression . . . and Anacin Tablets do not upset the stomach. Buy Anacin today!

3 out of 4 doctors recommend the ingredients of ANACIN

BROKEN VEINS... use waterproof COVERMARK

The only cream of its kind! Called the Modern Miracle by Reader's Digest. Completely covers every skin blemish. Ask for medically recommended waterproof Covermark. In all skin shades. $2.50. No Fed. Tax. At fine stores everywhere.

Lydia O'Leary

Write Dept J, Lydia O'Leary, Inc., 41 East 57th Street, New York 22, N. Y.

corns?

JUST RUB ON MOSCO

CORN and callus removal guaranteed or money back. Fast, easy, economical, invisible. Get Mosco today and ease those corns away! At drug stores everywhere. Regular jar, 35c, large economy jar, 60c. The Moss Co., Rochester, N. Y.

JARS 35c 60c

Lovely NAILS in A FLASH... with NU-NAILS ARTIFICIAL FINGERNAILS

Cover short, broken, thin nails with NU-NAILS. Applied in a jiffy with our amazing new quick-drying glue. Can be worn any length ... polished any shade. Help overcome nail-biting habit. Set of ten 29c. At dime, drug & dept. stores.

ONLY 29¢ SET OF TEN

NU-NAILS CO., Dept. 12-G
5251 W. Harrison, Chicago 44

Also Hollywood Fingernails... Permanent Dubonett Rose Color. polish required... 39c set.

WHY NOT EARN MORE?

You can easily earn extra money by selling magazine subscriptions in your spare time. Thousands of our representatives made their start by asking for our generous commission offer. No obligation. Address a postal today!

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
351 Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania

Undercover Strategy begins with

"Confidential"

by

Formfit

Marvelous . . . to look just as feminine as you feel.

It's so easy when you start with "Confidential" by Formfit. For this is the famous contour bra that's so comfortable you hardly know you have it on. And so flattering, you'll know you look your best.

Give yourself this re-assuringly feminine look. At fine stores everywhere.

Making the most of you . . ."Confidential" Strapless Bra No. 391. Cups are lined with a wispy light layer of foam rubber to bring you to a perfect A, B or C cup size. Embroidered White cotton in sizes 32A to 38C. $4.00

THE FORMFIT COMPANY • CHICAGO • NEW YORK • CANADIAN PLANT, TORONTO

DRESS BY RUDOLF

JERGENS KEYS COLOR TO YOUR PERSONALITY

If it's YELLOW you like, you have a sophisticated intellectual bent. You're rather deep with profound ideas, lasting friendships and—you can keep a secret!

Dress by Ceil Chapman.

If you go for GREEN, you delight in friends and travel. Generous, without expecting reward, you're popular. Your varied interests make you most agreeable company.

Dress by Claire McCardell.

If it's BLUE for you, you are a do-er. Never one to be silly, you're a good listener. Your ability to plan will accomplish a lot for you in life.

Dress by Adele Simpson.

If PINK is your color, you like life. You're interested in the world and people in a nice way. Refined always, your strong point is your feminine charm.

Dress by Greta Plattry.

NEW COLOR DECORETTES

...keyed to you (or your decor)

Delicate as they look, Jergens new Color Decorettes are all efficiency. A push-button top neatly drops Jergens Lotion right in your hand. It's the same creamy white Jergens you've known and used for years to stop detergent hands. Jergens prevents redness and roughness because it penetrates... doesn't just glove hands with sticky film. It actually helps replace natural moisture lost to wind, weather, housework.

But Color Decorettes are scarce...so step lively...get your favorite color now. And don't forget, Color Decorettes can be easily refilled with regular Jergens Lotion, on sale everywhere in the smart black and white bottle.

SPECIAL GIFT PRICE LIMITED TIME ONLY $1.25

Fashions shown available at better stores everywhere.

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL
BRUCE GOULD
BEATRICE BLACKMAR GOULD
EDITORS

COLIN SIMKIN COLLECTION

NEW ENGLAND SCENERY.
Fanny Palmer recognized in this scene all the essential characteristics which make a New England village. Published by Currier & Ives in 1866.

OIL PROFESSOR!

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

Prof. Philip Ward Burton, who teaches journalism at Syracuse University, recently stirred up a considerable ruckus, at least among females, by contributing to a national weekly an article with the title: Keep Women Out of College.

Although Professor Burton admits that women students are, as a group, more conscientious than men, and professes admiration for their industry, enthusiasm and ability, he sees the applications for college enrollment so pyramiding within the next ten years that there "won't be room for you [women]. . . . Something's got to give"—and what's got to give is the number of women seeking a college or university education.

He argues that: 1—Men need the college degree more than women; and 2—Most women have less "sensible and demanding" reasons for seeking a higher education. Quoting another source he says, "Only 13 per cent of high-school girls go to college primarily for intellectual training. Many pretend an intellectual interest to enter colleges where they do not really want to be." (Nobody suggests how many men go primarily for intellectual interests.) He then concludes, "Unmotivated girls are squeezing out highly motivated men."

He doesn't believe in the women's "career plans." Most of them are looking for husbands. He recalls an exceptionally brilliant student of his own—who had, however, "an inferiority complex"—whom he had to coax and coach to keep in college, but who (to his infinite disgust) married the day she graduated, saying, "I'm going to be a housewife."

"She could have settled for junior college and let me work with a man who'd utilize special training in his lifework."

He says, "Junior colleges can equip women adequately to be good wives, mothers, citizens or temporary job holders. They can study on an individual basis thereafter."

He also observes: "If a woman is lucky enough to go to college under harder selection she won't amble through and pick up a diploma and a husband. She'll really work."

But why must men go to college? For intellectual training? If they are, as a group, less conscientious, enthusiastic, industrious and able than women, as Professor Burton admits, why are they in college? And Professor Burton makes the why clear. They've got to have that diploma. They can't get a foot in the door of the employment market for the better-paying jobs without a degree. "It's mandatory in hundreds of firms as the first requisite for an interview." Without a diploma a man can't realize his "full earning potential. . . . The cash value of a degree has been estimated by the President's Committee on Education to be $100,000."

(I don't know how this is estimated, unless the annual interest on $100,000 at savings-bank rates is equal to the additional salary that the average college graduate earns over and above that of the average man without a diploma. But these studies of statistical averages are highly misleading.)

At any rate, the professor concludes that women, to be admitted to the institutions of higher learning of tomorrow, must prove to have superior intellects (to those of men) and have such goals as medicine, science, music, art, journalism, teaching. He does not, curiously, mention law, engineering, executive work or business management. He'd still let them attend women's colleges and teachers' colleges, but otherwise put a heavy quota on those entered in coeducational institutions, which include all the state-supported colleges and universities of the country.

I am not going to raise the feminist banner here, or argue whether women are more or less "brainy" than men, though I do recall the remark of the great feminist Anna Howard Shaw, who, when introduced as "a woman with the brains of a man," remarked, "Before I acknowledge this compliment I'd like to see the man whose brains I have."

Nor shall I contend that women own, control, spend and pay taxes on fully half of the nation's wealth; or invoke their rights as citizens in a country up in arms at barring any racial or religious minority from educational opportunity. Nor shall I compile a roster of distinguished and remarkable women who have headed, and do head, industries, great merchandising corporations and engineering enterprises; nor remind the professor that two outstanding atomic scientists are

CONTINUED ON PAGE 14

Executive Editor: Mary Bass
Special Projects Editor: Laura Lou Brookman
Associate Editors: Hugh MacNair Kahler, Wilhela Cushman, William E. Fink, Louella G. Shouer, Mary Lea Page, Dawn Crowell Norman, Margaret Davidson, Nora O'Leary, Glenn Matthew White, Donald Stuart, Tina S. Fredericks, Helen Everitt, Peter Briggs, Anne Einselen, Margaret Parton, Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland, Geraldine Rhoads, Nancy Crawford Wood
Contributing Editors: Richard Pratt, Bernardine Kielty, Gladys Denny Shultz, Margaret Hickey, Ruth Mills Teague, Barbara Benson
Assistant to the Editor: Nelle Keys Perry
Editorial Associates: John Werner, Ruth Mary Packard, Ruth Shapley Matthews, Alice Conkling, Joseph Di Pietro, Elizabeth Goetsch, Jean Todd Freeman, Eileen Sharpe, Betty Coe Spicer, Virginia Price, Joyce Posson, Neal Gilkyson Stuart, Elizabeth Hart
Assistant Editors: Victoria Harris, Alice Kastberg, Dorothy Anne Robinson, Albert Serwazi, June Schwartz, Liane Waite, Elizabeth McFarland, Alberte Wright, Corinna Wildman, Abbot Mills
Editorial Assistants: Lee Stowell Cullen, Patricia Martin, Flora Kerestedjian, Simone Smith, Hazel Owen, Isabel Blythe, Helen Olchvary, Olivia Donovan, Sally Platt, Marley Marseilles, Dorothy Markinko, Mary Jane Engel Jean Anderson, Joan Cornog, Jean Hartman Culp, Grant Harris, Mary Tinker Hatch, Mary Duncan Wright.

GO CAREFREE IN BEAU GESTE, 4.95

GO CAREFREE IN ALOUETTE, 4.95

GO CAREFREE IN

U.S. KEDETTES

THE WASHABLE CASUAL SHOES

GO CAREFREE IN VILLAGER, 4.95

GO CAREFREE IN MIDDY, 3.95

GO CAREFREE IN BALLET PUMP, 3.95

GO CAREFREE IN WHIRL, 3.95

If you want to go footloose and shoe-free, treat yourself to a pair of carefree Kedettes. These cool, bouncy little fabric toppers feel like nothing on, cost next to nothing...take only a minute to wash...and always look so right everywhere under the sun. All Kedettes in narrow and medium widths.

US RUBBER

United States Rubber

Rockefeller Center, New York 20, New York for the loveliest hair of your life..

Do you want brighter hair? darker hair? an exciting new fashion haircolor? . . .

color that lasts? or color you can gaily rinse in or spray on, and shampoo out?

color for your entire head? or just to touch-up some stray gray or dull-looking strands?

Whatever you desire, Roux is your answer. For Roux is America's first family of hair colorings and lighteners, both durable and temporary. Each is created to meet a specific need. And each gives the lovelier, natural looking results that make Roux the outstanding name in haircolor beauty.

Perhaps your haircolor isn't doing all you'd like for you. For a quick, simple answer to your need, try Roux.

At better beauty salons and cosmetic counters everywhere.

brighter, "happier" haircolor!

ROUX®

"AMERICA'S FIRST FAMILY OF HAIRCOLORINGS"

LASTING HAIRCOLORINGS
CREME COLOR SHAMPOO
CREME HAIR TINT

TEMPORARY HAIRCOLORINGS
CREME COLOR RINSE
COLOR RINSE (POWDER)
COLOR CURL HAIR SPRAY HAIR CRAYON

HAIR LIGHTENERS
CREME HAIR LIGHTENER
RAPID HAIR LIGHTENER
CREME COLORTONER

AND FOR YOUR HAIR CARE
CREME SHAMPOO
CREME RINSE
CREME HAIRDRESSING

Stops odor—checks perspiration round the clock!

ban®

rolls on protection that stays on!

More effective than messy creams!*

Easier to apply than drippy sprays! Not a crumbly stick!

And now ban costs you less!

73¢ Large Size formerly 98¢

98¢ Economy Size 50% more ban

*IN A SURVEY AGAINST THE LEADING CREAM DEODORANT 7 OUT OF 10 WOMEN PREFERRED BAN.

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 11

women; nor quote the contributions of women to education and the arts. All this, and more, is apropos to the theme.

But here I shall speak only of the purpose of education for either a man or a woman. And if I repeat some things I have already said in these pages, it is obviously necessary as long as there are Professor Burtons.

The purpose of education, Professor Burton, is to improve the mind—and character. It is to help create a personality capable of performing the duties of life with intelligence and sagacity, whatever these duties may turn out to be. It is not to get a "diploma."

It is to develop inner resources of mental strength and enjoyment, to excite an interest in learning for its own sake and teach the student how to learn. It is to liberate and civilize.

A "liberal education," which most women seek in the liberal-arts colleges, does not, or should not, aim to fit a man or woman for a "job." It is not an apprentice school for industrial companies, nor can their scouts, who according to Professor Burton invade campuses every year in a grab for degree holders, possibly gauge more than very superficially the future abilities of the young men they interview. A diploma or degree from a liberal-arts college does nothing more than certify that its owner has "successfully," with more or less honor, completed certain prescribed studies under circumstances very different from those he will encounter in working life. If industries regard colleges as trainee centers, they should support them and take the burden off the taxpayer. Also, they ought to be able to devise examinations that any youth could take, regardless of whether he does or does not possess a piece of paper called a diploma. But actually I have seen reports that they are coming to prefer graduates with a liberal-arts rather than specialized undergraduate education, recognizing that mind is more important than techniques.

Speech belongs half to the speaker, half to the listener. MONTAIGNE

Managerial ability, ingenuity and business acumen are, however, by no means confined to those with a college education. The history of American industry demonstrates this. Henry Ford, Sr., who was a genius, never went to college. But the Ford Foundation, handling the millions he left, would probably not employ even a minor executive without a "degree."

General Electric's Charles Edward Wilson's formal education ended with the public schools. He began his "career" as a shipping clerk, and learned accounting, production and engineering as he went along.

Brig. Gen. David Sarnoff emigrated to America with his parents when he was nine, having had previously only elementary rabbinical schooling administered by a relative. All that the future president of the Radio Corporation of America later learned from formal teaching was in night-school classes.

Benjamin Franklin, one of the wisest, greatest and most brilliant men of his times, was, like many another genius, self-taught.

Likewise Abraham Lincoln.

There is no record in Who's Who in America of Harry S. Truman's ever having received a "degree" except honorary ones. He attended the public schools and "studied at the Kansas City School of Law." I suppose the climax of any American "career" is to be President of the United States. But no "diploma" will get a man there.

It is hard to find any person eminent in American letters who has not had a thorough liberal-arts education in college. But William Saroyan is an exception.

The same is true in journalism. If I take as examples the dozen greatest journalist "careers" with which I am familiar—editors, editorial writers and famous reporters—all are graduates in liberal arts from universities, but not one, I think, ever studied journalism in college. One is a bachelor and one a master of science, indicating that they did not originally intend to follow the profession they later adopted. All studied history, languages, economics—the best preparation, I think, for writers or editors of any kind. One took a master's in philosophy.

The idea that a graduate will or should step out of college into exactly the activity or profession he or she will ultimately follow does not correspond to the facts, and especially the facts about the greatest and most illustrious men and women. A college or university can contribute to refine life's values, and no values for a great or even a free man can be determined in dollars and cents. In the end we all make ourselves, for better or worse, but a higher education can help us to learn more quickly and easily from books and from life. And that is just as true for a woman as for a man.

Many years ago I attended the university where Professor Burton is now teaching. Subsequently this university has paid me honors beyond my deserts, for which I am most grateful. But I am much more grateful for the education I received there. Nobody tried to bend that education into training for a specific career. I cannot remember when I did not want to write. But for seven years following my graduation (with a diploma, degree, and with honors) I had to take any job that turned up and no publisher, newspaper or magazine was clamoring for my services. What had been stimulated in Syracuse University was a desire to learn—about mankind, his past, his present, what was going on, why it was going on, whither it was, or might be, tending. I never had a conscious desire to be a journalist. But I wanted to travel, to see the world, and without money the only way I could conceive of doing so was to write about it. So eventually, after many tribulations—all of them educational—I became what I am.

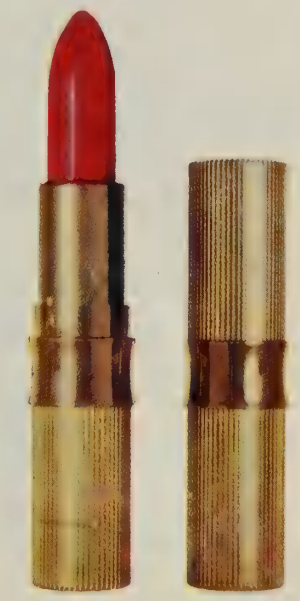
But if, like Professor Burton's disappointing student, I had become "merely a housewife," would that education have been completely lost to me?

What an absurd notion!

Junior college is enough to fit a woman to be a good wife, mother, citizen?

Good wives, mothers and citizens don't grow on every tree, and some of the best I have known have never gone through grade school. But I can tell Professor Burton something that, being a man, he certainly cannot know, and that is that it takes more education, in the true meaning of that word, to be these things than to be a successful journalist.

It requires enormous intelligence, innate or acquired by cultivation, to discharge the full responsibilities of managing a household; doing its endlessly repetitive work without deadening the mind; bringing up children, restraining, encouraging and helping them; being a companion and helpmeet to one's husband, helpfully and intelligently interested in his work; and being, at the same time, able to take on his duties and responsibilities if she must, as thousands of women have had to.



Combining a demanding career and a family is so difficult for a woman to manage that from personal and often bitter experience I would like to see fewer women attempt it. But the idea that an educated mother is less important than an educated copy writer is preposterous. It is the mother, far more than the father, who transmits to her children their tastes, their standards and their interests. The autobiographies of great men almost always record the influence of a great and intelligent mother. And it is the purpose, the prime and even sole purpose, of education to improve the intelligence of the mind and the heart.

Professor Burton ends up his argument by asking a rhetorical question of the girls: "If you had to choose, would you rather own a diploma yourself or have your husband own one?"

Oh, professor! How little you know about women! Women don't marry a piece of paper, even an embossed parchment, with a gold seal and a red ribbon, engraved in flowing script. Women marry men. I quite agree with Bernard Shaw that women are the pursuers bent on preserving and replenishing the race—and a good thing too. They marry men for

CONTINUED ON PAGE 16

NEW!

DU BARRY

Royal Lipstick

with Royal Jelly of the Queen Bee

Fabulously rich formula soothes and pampers your lips every minute it's on!

You'll get a delicious little shiver of excitement, the minute you smooth on this startlingly new kind of lipstick. Because in all your born days, your lips never looked so lush and lovely. Soft and full as a child's. Almost good enough to eat!

And day by day, the excitement grows . . . your lips feel moistened, softened, nourished . . . because the rich, rare beauty benefits of Royal Jelly are blended right into this never-before formula . . . to work their mysterious wonders every minute your lipstick's on! How pretty can a queen be? Try DuBarry Royal Lipstick today . . . and see!
P.S. Its stay-on power will astound you!

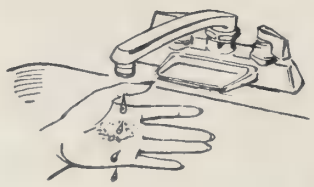
Royal Lipstick, in a queen's-ransom of a case, 1.50*. Click-in refills, in 8 fit-for-a-queen colors, 1.10* each. *PLUS TAX

©1958 RICHARD HUDNUT

MOISTURE-PROOF your baby against diaper irritation



Here's How-

When changing diapers, apply soothing ZBT Baby Powder generously. ZBT protects like oil . . . guards tender skin against urine scald and diaper rash.

After baby's bath, sprinkle entire body with soothing ZBT Baby Powder, to protect against chafing and prickly heat.

Make this test! Smooth ZBT powder on the palm of your hand. Let drops of water fall on palm. See for yourself how ZBT Baby Powder repels moisture, where ordinary powders absorb it.

Used by hundreds of hospital nurseries

ZBT BABY POWDER CONTAINS OLIVE OIL

soothes like powder protects like oil

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 14

many reasons. Sometimes (especially when young) because they are good-looking—which at least holds a reasonable promise of handsome children. But usually a woman "sees" something in a man—sometimes others do, too, sometimes others do not—something that suggests that the man needs her, to bring out qualities he himself is not confident of. And sometimes she is right.

Professor Burton does not tell us whom his brilliant feminine journalist student married the day she graduated. Perhaps she married a classmate. And if he becomes a famous journalist, it may be due to teamwork.

If a girl goes to college in the half-unconscious hope of finding a superior husband, is that such a despicable "motivation"? A better one, from the viewpoint of the race, than wanting a certificate. And if men marry their feminine classmates, aren't they looking for superior, companionable and compatible wives? Should they go scouting around high schools or junior colleges, while barring the university gates to their possible future wives?

Too many people, male and female, are going to college purely for social contacts and that diploma which they hope—and are falsely told—will open the doors to financial success. Good gracious! Illiterate ruffians have become millionaires; doctors of philosophy seldom, if ever.

Men also "amble through," taking the cinch courses, if only they lead to a "degree." The overcrowding of colleges can be met by restoring higher education to its proper status as an institution of learning, not a diploma factory.

Fools are never uneasy. Stupidity is without anxiety. GOETHE

I have a witty friend who adheres to a theory that the history of human culture can be recorded in terms of beards and bosoms. Whenever the male has been bearded, the female has been bosomy and hippy. In the most civilized periods men have shaved their beards and women have been slimmer and narrower, and the sexes have not been so differentiated. I'm not sure it's true, and certainly the epochs have overlapped. But it seems to me that now men, who are perpetually planning and talking about atomic wars (and keeping women dumb), are growing at least internal beards, while designing clothes to make women look like nothing at all—eclipsed in a hat and dehumanized in a sack.

Professor Burton apparently belongs to the invisibly bearded caveman. "Marry 'em early, tell 'em nothing and treat 'em rough." A few words might be said about the "inferiority complexes" of the bearded "he-man." But I shall desist. However, this may certainly be said of epochs:

There never yet has been a great, high and amusing civilization—from Attic Greece to eighteenth-century France—without a large number of civilized, witty women, whose social function has been to prick the balloon of masculine self-inflation. We recommend to Professor Burton George Meredith's essay on Comedy and the Uses of the Comic Spirit—which this Syracusan read when a student there. The suppression of women as minds has always meant the brutalization of society.

That (as Meredith observed) was the trouble with Imperial (and later Nazi) Germany; is the trouble with Russia; and is increasingly and alarmingly the trouble with an ever more militarized and regimented America.

But to get back to the debate: If almost any young man can enter college (because he "needs" that diploma), and a girl to enter must be twice as smart, God help the lads! One gal will outdistance a dozen of them in every class and won't even marry one of such dumbbells!

Being strongly pro-male, I shudder to think of their fate! The "inferiority complex" will be transferred. Even Professor Burton might become afflicted by it! END

Thanks

(perhaps to you too)

FROM ALL OF US AT

PY-O-MY BAKING MIXES

The best ads our young company has are the enthusiastic users who recommend our Py-O-My mixes to their friends.

If you haven't heard, Py-O-My mixes include:
BLUEBERRY MUFFIN · APPLE THINS
BROWNIE · YEAST COFFEE CAKE
PUDDIN' CAKE · ICE BOX PIE
NEW BANANA-NUT LOAF

Switch to Morrow
TOMORROW'S FINE FURNITURE ...TODAY
TAILORED For Today's Gracious Living
LIVING ROOM AND BEDROOM FURNITURE from $99.95
At Your Favorite Furniture Dealers or write to Morrow* Furniture
A DIVISION OF LITTLE ROCK FURNITURE MFG. CO.
LITTLE ROCK, ARKANSAS ... SINCE 1900
©LRFMC

STOP ANNOYING NOISES AND WASTING WATER

GET THE GENUINE WATER MASTER
America's Largest Selling
TOILET TANK BALL
Noisy running toilets can waste over 1000 gallons of water a day. Stop this annoying noise, waste and expense. The efficient patented Water-Master Tank Ball instantly stops the flow of water after each flushing, stops the flow everytime, not just some of the time.
75¢ AT HARDWARE STORES EVERYWHERE Higher in Canada

MORE PEOPLE USE

Sugarine
SWEETER THAN SUGAR YET NO FOOD VALUE
Doctors recommend Sugarine for diabetics, overweights, lo-calorie diets. Pure, Harmless, Economical.
GUARANTEED NON-FATTENING 4 OZ.—75¢
AT FOOD STORES EVERYWHERE

MORE CASH FOR YOU!
YES, you can have more cash in your pocket if you put your spare time to work. Write for our money-making plan. No obligation.
CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY, 350 Independence Square, Phila. 5, Pa.

GLADYS TABER'S favorite recipes
Get her big new personal cookbook,
WHAT COOKS AT STILLMEADOW
More than 200 wonderful recipes.
$3.95 • LIPPINCOTT

New Simoniz Floor Wax— childproof because there's vinyl in it!

Vinyl—tough, brilliant vinyl—makes new Simoniz® Floor Wax the toughest, glossiest floor wax ever.

Now, kids can spill on your floors. Romp on them. Track on them. Vinyl, the miracle ingredient, means childproof protection.

Floors never shone so mirror-bright. Never stayed so bright, so long . . . even with frequent damp mopping. Yet, when it comes to re-waxing, new Simoniz Floor Wax removes evenly—no blotching.

New Simoniz Floor Wax polishes itself. You don't need to buff. You don't need to rub. Try it.

For all floors— linoleum, rubber, asphalt, vinyl tile, finished wood, terrazzo

SIMONIZ MAKES IT

I don't think you can call us a "stuffy" family...

At least, if romping with the kids and making friends easily is any indication, you can't.

But there's one thing that Bill and I are very stuffy about!

We expect our youngsters to have some plain, old-fashioned good manners. Not just because it makes life pleasanter for us—but because it will help them live happier, more successful lives.

So naturally, we want our family to grow up with things that inspire good manners and instill quiet self-confidence. Things that are real, and beautiful, and help build family traditions. One of these is family silver—real solid silver.

That's why we got our own handsome, heavy International Sterling—why we use it every day.

It's gratifying to see the children respond to its beauty—to see them run their fingers along the satiny, shining sweep of it. And they listen carefully when we explain the correct way to use the different pieces in the set.

Yes, our lovely set of International Sterling is doing just what we had hoped it would—helping us teach our youngsters good manners.

When you choose your family silver, ask to see the many lovely patterns in International Sterling. There is one to please every eye. Beauty that can never be matched in other tableware. Shining, mellow loveliness that will never wear out—only increase with daily use.

Buy your International Sterling a place setting at a time, or take home the 42-piece Family Living Service for eight and pay for it later.

International Sterling

The solid silver with beauty that lives forever.

Sterling is for now and for you

THE INTERNATIONAL SILVER C
Meriden, Connecticut
Many patterns available in Canada

"The way to decide about your schools is to visit them, hear what they are trying to do, see how wisely they are carrying out their aims."

DR. SPOCK TALKS WITH MOTHERS

The good teacher tries to see where each child stands and to stimulate him to go on from there.

Educating today's child for today's world

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

What do critics of our elementary and high schools mean when they accuse them of being "soft"?

Many object to the idea of making subjects appealing and easy to comprehend, believing that learning must be difficult if the intellect is to be benefited. They object to pupils' sometimes being passed into the next class without having satisfactorily covered all the work, feeling that this removes the main incentive to succeed. Many of them believe that schools (and colleges) should restrict themselves to training the intellect; therefore they feel that practical courses, like typing and car driving, and life-adjustment discussions confuse the issue of true learning and steal time from it.

Some critics concede that a majority of pupils cannot go at a fast pace or reach a high level of intellectual training, but they think that certain educators advocate holding the bright pupils down to the level of the average.

Let me try to give a general answer by summarizing some of the newer concepts that have been developed in the twentieth century in America through the observations and experiments of educators and psychologists.

They are convinced that healthy children don't have to be urged or compelled to learn. Children are eager to learn. They learn more rapidly if the material and experiences presented to them are carefully tailored to their interest and level of understanding. To be sure, there is some drudgery in every course, just as there is in every job, and it has to be done. But it will get done better if the person has some enthusiasm for the whole subject and understands the relationship of the drudgery to it. In other words, there has to be a motive if hard work is to be done. Housework goes more easily if your husband is appreciative. I willingly spend hours sanding my boat because I want to sail in it. A boy may be flunking arithmetic and still know the batting averages of all the major-league players of the past five years. A highly competitive child may do his schoolwork perfectly because he wants to excel. The average child, like the average adult, doesn't have a craving to absorb dry facts or practice dull skills just for the sake of knowing them. He can't be bullied into learning very much. He must have a natural interest or he must see a worth-while application, if he is really to gain knowledge.

In order to get the most out of formal instruction, children also need opportunities to feel, to use, to act out the subjects they are studying. This is how they make knowledge a part of themselves. So they absorb arithmetic by running a school store. A writing exercise consists in composing a letter to a sick classmate. The physical geography of the United States is learned in the building of a contour map. The importance of diet elements is demonstrated by their own experiments in feeding mice right in the classroom.

Some skills will be learned more eagerly if they are not taught as separate exercises, but applied, all together, to a real-life situation. So there are "projects" of various kinds.

A third-grade class will be fascinated by American Indians, so this may be their major project for part of the year. They avidly read books and ask questions about Indians because they really want to know. In the process, they come to understand American geography and history without thinking of them as separate subjects. They paint a mural or build a model of an Indian village, and these are also vivid ways to learn. They practice arithmetic by counting and trading the way the Indians did.

Throughout the higher grades, too, history and geography are taught together (where they surely belong) as social studies, and this leads naturally to discussions of civics, ethics, human relations and current events.

Since no two children are equal in aptitude in any one subject, let alone all subjects, there should be flexibility in the work of the class. They don't all necessarily read the same books, do the same exercises, or contribute the same skill to the project. The teacher tries to see where each child is and to stimulate him to go forward from there. In a vital subject like reading (or arithmetic) the class may be divided into two or more groups which read at different times because they read at different levels. The individuals who are most advanced in reading will be the ones who will go to the library to get the information which the class wants for some project. Or there may be additional storybooks and books related to class projects available on a table in the classroom, which skillful readers are encouraged to read to themselves. The term "enrichment" is applied to such methods for challenging the more advanced students. This flexible approach requires well-trained teachers, small classes and, preferably, a room where one group can sit in a circle around the teacher for reading while the others are at work elsewhere.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 23

No more tears
from soap in the eyes

Use the shampoo that can't burn or irritate eyes.

Leaves hair silky-soft, easy to comb.

Johnson's BABY
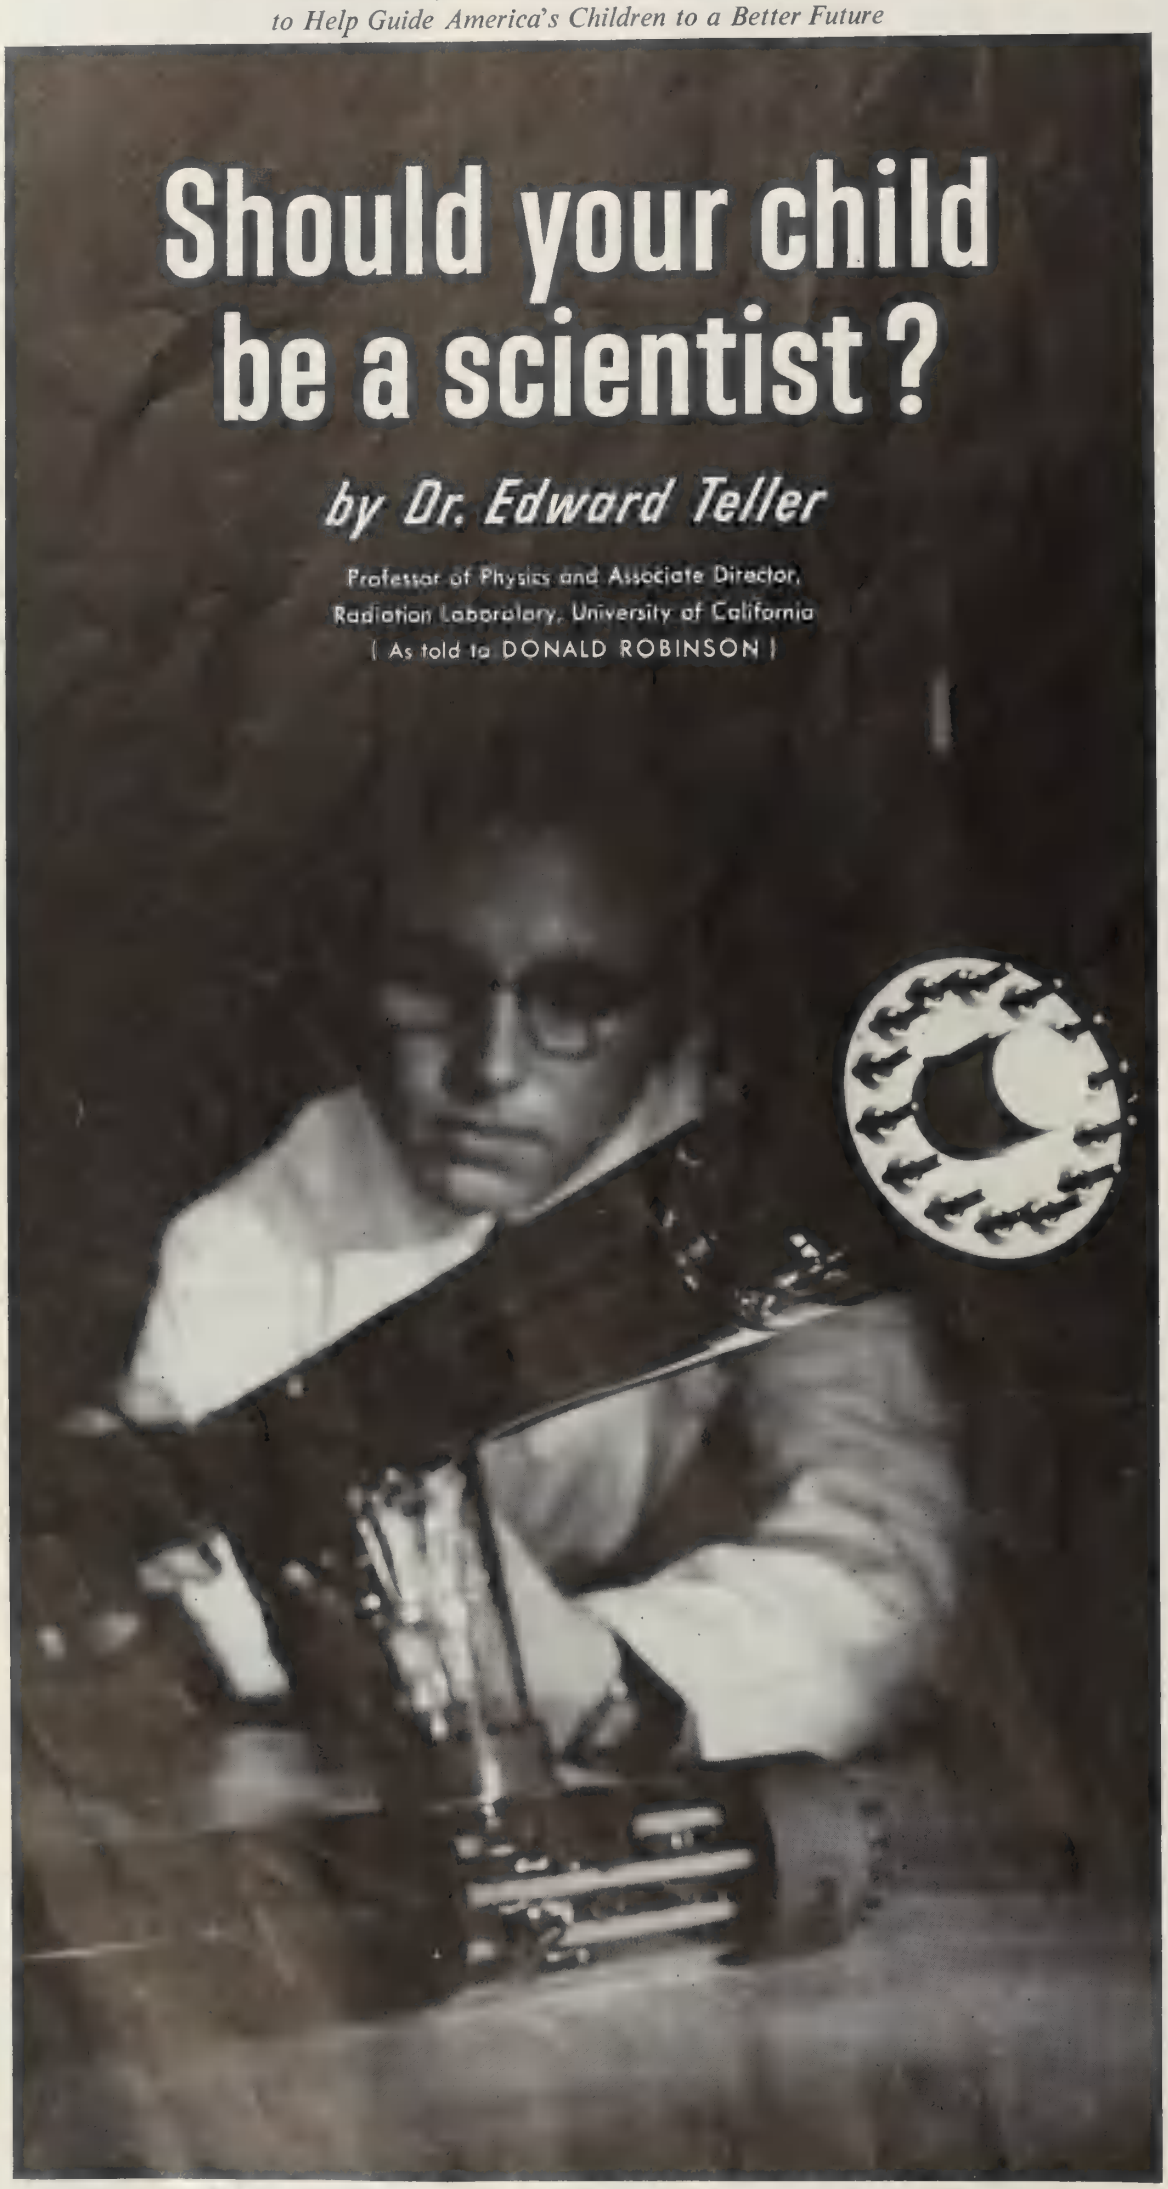
SHAMPOO



The 31st in a Series of Advertisements Presented by New York Life to Help Guide America's Children to a Better Future

Should your child be a scientist?

by Dr. Edward Teller

Professor of Physics and Associate Director, Radiation Laboratory, University of California

(As told to DONALD ROBINSON)

Laboratory research often occupies a considerable amount of the scientist's time. Here a scientist examines an experimental tube for testing photosensitive devices.

NEVER HAS MAN learned so much, and so fast, about the universe he lives in as he has during this century.

We have learned things that are more surprising than any story in science fiction, more beautiful than anything in music.

Just think of the way we have expanded the boundaries of the universe. On New Year's Day, 1900, our main attention was still focused on stars a few thousand light years away. Today, we are studying galaxies a billion light years away.

At the turn of the century, even a simple item like the size of the atom was unknown to us.

The chemists had used atoms as a kind of symbol, but in the year 1900 we didn't even have proof that atoms really existed.

Today, the atom is a demonstrated reality. Both its structure and the laws which underlie this structure are completely understood. We know, for instance, that each atom has a nucleus, loaded with very much more energy than the atom itself. We know, too, that individual atoms are as unpredictable as people are supposed to be, but that we can calculate their behavior en masse through the laws of averages.

These are just some of the epochal advances pure science has made. There are more. Many more.

We have gotten an entirely new conception of time in this century. The mathematicians have given us new forms of logic. The geneticists have discovered the laws of inheritance. The chemists have come to understand the structure of crystals, and the complex molecules upon which life depends.

Is it any wonder that historians are calling this "the golden age of pure research"?

In the applied sciences, progress has been as spectacular. It has literally transformed our world within the past few decades.

In this short span the applied scientists have given us automobiles and supersonic airplanes. They have developed rockets that can attain speeds of 18,000 miles-per-hour and lift satellites up into outer space.

They have given us instant, world-wide communication. They have electrified our homes and made our lives far easier. They have evolved electronic equipment that promises us real automation.

And that's not all, by any means.

Years back, tuberculosis and pneumonia took an appalling toll. No longer. The problem of infectious disease has been largely solved in our time.

Years back, we had to rely on particular places for their particular riches. Such as rubber. No longer. Chemistry has provided us with synthetics.

No more do we have to worry because our coal and oil stocks are petering out. We have nuclear power at our disposal now. It should generate all the energy we require for at least 200 years, and it will enable us to supply electricity to the most remote corners of the globe.

Much as science has accomplished in this century, there is still more to be done.

Science will do it. Of that I'm confident.

Before the century is over, we will have explored our entire planetary system reasonably well. We will have found out how to influence the weather. We will have learned how to make proper use of the ocean. Today, our methods of fishing are as crude as they were in the Stone Age, but in the not distant future we will be seeding fish and plants in the sea as effectively as we cultivate cattle and crops on land.

Come the year 2000 and we will have achieved a cure for cancer and heart disease. We will know how to make materials to order, synthetically.

On the broad front of pure science we will have explored the basic structure of the atomic nucleus. We will have peered into the history of the universe down into the distant past, six or seven billion years ago.

Can you think of any other profession that affords its followers the chance to find such towering, demonstrable truths, and to do so much good?

Yet, let me say this as strongly as I can.

I do not want any young person to choose science as his lifework simply because he hopes to be the one to solve these big, exciting problems.

In my opinion, one should never enter science with a view to the end results. The thought of achievement, fame, position or monetary reward should have no bearing on the decision.

There is but one good reason for going into science. It is that a person enjoys the day-to-day details of scientific research for the sake of those day-to-day details.

Only this kind of a boy or girl will find contentment and success in science. The others are foredoomed to failure and frustration.

I have seen youngsters embark on a scientific career with the fervent expectation that they were going to make world-shattering discoveries. Instead of relishing their everyday activities, they kept fretting about the "big break-through" they dreamed of.

Naturally, it didn't come. Knowledge cannot be wooed so brusquely.

If your child is interested in science, for science's sake and for no other reason, he will find all doors opened to him.

We have a desperate need for new scientists today in America. The fact is that we must have them, if we are to survive as a free, democratic nation. The President of the United States himself has termed this "the most critical problem" confronting the American people.

Year by year, the Soviet Union has been overtaking us in the scientific arena. Back in the '30's, the Russians had to bring in American engineers and machinery to help them with comparatively easy jobs like constructing dams. Today, Russia has more scientists, engineers and technicians than the United States, and is graduating more than twice as many as we are each year.

Not long ago, the National Science Foundation made a check on the status of higher scientific education in the United States. The findings for one sample year were shocking.

In all America, only 986 persons got their Ph.D.'s in chemistry, that year, only 470 in physics, only 230 in mathematics.

Just twenty-three persons got their Ph.D.'s in astronomy. A mere ten got them in meteorology.

Figures like that explain why the U.S.S.R. now has 15,000 more people at the doctorate level in the various sciences than we have in the United States.

If Russia continues to outpace us in this fashion, the results will be catastrophic for us. The Russians will be the ones to land on the moon first. They will be the ones to control weather first. They will be the ones to perfect weapons so overwhelming that no one will be able to resist them. They will lead the world in everything, including science and its peaceful applications.

Then freedom will be lost here and everywhere.

A scientific career is more than a duty, though. It is an opportunity.

Science is fun. It offers people the supreme pleasure of clear, complete understanding, of creating order where there was confusion.

You have the fun of being thoroughly absorbed in what you're doing. And you have the fun of working for a clear-cut decision. It's like chess. Ordinarily, in that wonderful game, there is no question of who wins or loses. Similarly, in science, there is no doubt as to whether you have solved or failed to solve a problem. The proofs are definite.

In many fields, another person's success can be a disadvantage to you. Not in science. Here anybody's success is your success. For one thing, you gain personally from the new knowledge that has been reached. For a second, progress of any sort points out the path for you to further progress.

Best of all, science has objective criteria and a language that are the same in every country. With them, scientific people can, and do, cooperate with each other no matter what their nationalities are.

Let me put it this way. A person who becomes a good scientist joins an international community of people who practice the brotherhood of men.

Sometimes, parents say to me,

"Don't you have to be a genius to make a career for yourself in science?"

My answer to them is "No."

To my mind, talent is nothing but an unusual amount of concentrated interest. If you have this intense interest in a subject—and the capacity to work hard—you will do well at it.¶

In most sciences, this interest is manifested young. When Karl Friedrich Gauss, the greatest mathematician of all, was a little boy of nine, for example, his teacher in a Brunswick, Germany, school asked the class to add up a long series of progressive numbers.

The other children worked an hour, laboriously adding the lengthy columns of figures. Little Karl spent scarcely a minute on it. He looked up, looked down, and jotted the correct answer on his slate. At his tender age, he'd already figured out how to work arithmetic progression.

I know that in my case I was fascinated by numbers in earliest childhood. My mother used to put me to bed before I wanted to go. So, I'd lie there in the dark and compute the number of seconds in an hour, a day, a month, a year. I did not always get the right answers, but it was fun.

It is up to parents to recognize such interest in science if their children have it and to encourage its growth.

How do you know if your child's interest in science is a genuine one?

By his curiosity about scientific subjects.

By the fact that he asks intelligent questions about science and profits from your answers, so that each successive question shows a higher level of understanding.

By the fact that he loves to work scientific problems—mathematical puzzles, perhaps—and by the fact that he insists on solving each problem completely.

By a bull-dog quality which won't let him drop a subject until he understands it inside out.

A child does not need a lightning-fast mind to be a scientist. Nor does he need a miraculous memory. Nor is it necessary that he get very high grades in school.

The only point that counts is that the child have a high degree of interest in science.

What should parents do to encourage this interest?

Since a child's attitudes are usually set by the time he is twelve, parents should start early to expose him to science and to create the kind of an environment which will stimulate him in that direction.

I was lucky along those lines. When I was ten, my father saw that I had a scientific urge and took me to visit an old mathematics professor of his.

The professor was not very impressive in appearance or anything else. But I learned something priceless from him. He started speaking to me about his specialty, projective geometry, and I discovered that mathematics was fun for him. That he had more fun than any grown-up I'd known.

Then and there, I resolved to have fun like that, too.

If you ask me, the wise parent should talk about science to his children, give them books to read, and arrange for them to meet scientists. He should see to it that they take all the science courses their school offers.

A good teacher can do wonders in this regard. Let me say here that the essential characteristic of a good teacher is not that he knows his subject well or can teach it efficiently. It is that he loves his subject and makes that love evident to his pupils.

In the event that your child does settle upon science for a profession, I would recommend that he get as thorough an education as possible. I do not say that a Ph.D. is a prerequisite to advancement, but it does have great value. If your child does not choose science for his profession, I would urge that he at least take science appreciation courses at school. In this scientific age, all of us should have some grasp of the developments that are shaping our lives.

Much as I respect science, I don't want to leave you with the impression that a career in it is all milk and honey.

It isn't. Unfortunately, scientists are a group apart in America. People often think of them as "high-brows" and "squares."

As a result, the scientists have tended to withdraw into themselves. Many have lost contact with the common man.

This is bad.

However, I feel that the public attitude toward science is gradually beginning to change. Eventually, I believe, scientists will come into their own and be recognized for what they are—one of the most important, small components of our big society. The time may even come when teen-agers will look up to their school's science stars as admiringly as they do to their school's football heroes.

A healthy sign in this connection is that salaries for scientists are now edging upward. Throughout the country, universities, private research laboratories, industrial concerns and the government are bringing scientists' pay up to a level which will assure them a comfortable, secure life.

Not that money should be a factor in deciding on a scientific career.

I well remember the day I told my father that I planned to be a scientist. He was vehemently opposed.

"You'll never make a decent living as a scientist," he warned.

"I don't care," I replied. "If I do anything else, I may make more money but I'll only have fun after hours. If I work at science, I'll have fun all the time."

I do.

nylic

HOW TO HELP YOUR CHILD HAVE THE CAREER HE WANTS

Many factors will enter into your child's choice of a career: his interests, his ambitions, his abilities, the counsel he receives from teachers, friends and family. But, most of all, it will depend on his opportunities to get the training he needs to enter the field of his choice.

Even though his college days are still years away, it's never too soon to start making sure that your child will have the opportunity to continue his education when the time comes.

Your New York Life agent has chosen as his career the business of helping families plan for the future—for education, for retirement, for all the things which life insurance helps make possible. Through training and experience he has become a highly qualified specialist. You'll find him both able and willing to help you.

Booklets available on many careers

This article on a Scientific Career is one of a continuing series on career opportunities for young men and women. Thus far, similar articles have been prepared on Newspapering, Law, Medicine, Accounting, Teaching, Architecture, Aeronautical Engineering, Electronic Engineering, Public Service, Farming, Chemistry, Selling, Nursing, Starting a Business of Your Own, Pharmacy, Dentistry, Banking, Printing, Home Economics, the Mineral Industry, Personnel Work, Retailing, Atomic Science, Librarianship, the Armed Forces, Engineering, Food Retailing, Medical Technology, Traffic Managing and Secretarial Career. Each is available in booklet form and will be sent to you on request. You'll also find additional help in our free booklet, "The Cost of Four Years at College." Just drop a postcard to:

NEW YORK LIFE Insurance Company

51 Madison Ave., Dept. 31-J. New York 10, N. Y.

The New York Life Agent in Your Community is a Good Man to Know
Copyright 1958, New York Life Insurance Company

Fragile...handle with Johnson's

Skin so delicate, you touch it in wonder...
You know that only the finest skin care will do...
Only the purest powder...
Only the gentlest oil...
Only Johnson's.

1968 Johnson & Johnson

MRS. CHARLES FUNK, Baltimore, says:

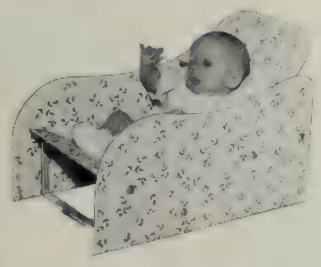
"I prefer St. Joseph Aspirin For Children because it's so easy to give exactly as the doctor orders"

St. Joseph Aspirin For Children assures the best, safest, fastest pain-relieving, fever-reducing help money can buy.

More doctors approve it. Children like its pure orange flavor, accept it willingly. America's mother-and-child favorite.

Accurate dosage assured. Refuse substitutes. Buy the best for your child.

World's Largest Selling Aspirin For Children



200 Tablets 79c ▪ 100 Tablets 49c ▪ 12 Tablets 12c

Welsh "Nip 'n Nap" SLEEPER-SEAT

Especially For Tiny Infants!

SCIENTIFIC SUPPORT WHILE FEEDING AND SLEEPING

So Easy for mother! She can go about her work; won't have to hold baby while he sits up for his bottle. A Nip – then a Nap!

So Comfy for baby, with his spine supported, room to kick his legs.

Padded! Lined! Flower-sprigged!

WELSH CO., ST. LOUIS 4, MO.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 19

Not all schools handle the problem of the rapid learner in the same way. A few large-city systems have one central school which the brightest children from all over the city attend, but this separates them from their neighbors. Some schools are more willing than others to allow advanced pupils to skip grades, but this may isolate them from children of their own age and social level. Some schools with two or more classes to a grade divide the pupils frankly on the basis of brightness, but this has an unwholesome effect on certain pupils in each classroom, who decide that brightness rather than growing up is what the school values, and that they themselves are either superior or inferior. I agree that it should be an obligation of the school in one way or another to provide work that is challenging to every pupil. But since I realize that no matter how children are divided into groups, there will still be differences in their ability to cope with different subjects, and also since many schools will be able to have only one class for each grade, it seems preferable to me—as it does to so many educators—to rely primarily on the well-trained teacher and the small class to provide the degree of flexibility and individual attention that are called for in an ordinary grade, especially when I take into account all the other advantages that come from the well-trained teacher and the small class. It is good to remember that this is essentially the same method that was used quite successfully in the one-room country school, before school buses made consolidated schools possible.

You can preach a better sermon with your life than with your lips.
OLIVER GOLDSMITH

In the high-school years, when students go from room to room for their different subjects anyway, and when students heading for college are taking somewhat different subjects from those taking a vocational course, then the separation of students on the basis of aptitude and aim comes about quite naturally rather than arbitrarily.

Teachers have been convinced that in many of the cases in which a child is behind in one or several subjects, he will learn better in the long run (and not become disheartened) if he is permitted to go on with his own age, provided there will be enough flexibility in the next class so that the teacher there will be able to give him the help he will need. Most educators do not believe that fear of failure is a generally effective motive for learning—particularly in the elementary grades. To be sure, some high-school or college students who have been distracted by outside activities can be jacked up by the threat of failure, but most pupils who fail do so because of deeper troubles, which are not cured by fear.

It has been recognized that children (and adults too) learn through liking the teacher, wanting to know what she knows, take on the skills she employs. So the personality and attitude of the teacher are as important considerations as her grasp of the material she will teach, particularly in the lower grades.

Since the basic purpose of all education is to help us get along in the world, and since half of the problem here is how to get along with others and ourselves, modern educators, instead of ignoring human feelings (as schools have usually done in past ages), try to let them come into the open for classroom discussions: Why do some kids make trouble in the cafeteria line? How do teen-agers feel about various parental regulations? Where do our prejudices come from? In some schools, discussions about human relations are provided for in a separate course, called perhaps "life adjustment," which might meet once a week. I feel, as many educators do, that it is even more important for such discussions to come out in ordinary classes such as English, history, social studies, biology. Then the students will be reminded that human relations are the business of everybody.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 26

Let's start from scratch with Jockey Jr.® BRAND underwear made only by Coopers®

Mother makes sure that he starts off right with Jockey Jr. underwear. Tailored especially to fit him, Jockey coverage does away with all gaps and binding. And soft, gentle Jockey brand knit fabric never causes chafing! Heat-resistant elastic waistbands and leg openings last wash after wash.

Give your lad a break, and introduce him now to Jockey Jr. underwear! Remember: comfortable boys are happy boys!

known the world over by this symbol ® sold in 98 countries ▪ Cooper's, Incorporated, Kenosha, Wisconsin

Now—so easy to be a blonde again!

Actually simpler than setting your hair!

If your hair was born to be blonde—and isn't—or if you're a brownette with blonde ambitions, fabulous Light and Bright, Richard Hudnut's shining new discovery, is for you! It's a different hair lightener, so easy to use, you can "do-it-yourself" at home. It was designed to bring out all the hidden gold in your hair . . . make you as blonde as you were truly born to be.

Light and Bright is so simple and easy to use; simpler, in fact, than setting your hair! There's no messy mixing. No complicated testing. No worrisome timing. All you do is apply Light and Bright to dry hair, using a brush, cotton pad or small sponge. Then comb through, let dry—and that's it!

Light and Bright works so gently, so gradually, you don't have to worry about getting too blonde too fast. It gives you genuine "color control"! Each time you use Light and Bright, your hair gets a little lighter, a little brighter. Until finally, when you reach just the color that's right, you stop.

Light and Bright contains no harsh ammonia. Instead it's formulated with a special built-in conditioner that helps keep your hair soft and easy-to-manage. You'll really be delighted at the wonderful way Light and Bright makes you a true, natural-looking blonde again with lovely, shining-soft hair! And once this gentle home brightener has brought to light your real blondeness, that drab, mousey look is gone for keeps. Yes, when you use Light and Bright, your glamourous new golden look won't wash out or fade. And Light and Bright is guaranteed by Good Housekeeping.

Don't wait another day. Let gentle new Light and Bright make you as blonde as you were born to be. Get a bottle today—be a blonde beauty tomorrow. Only $1.50 plus federal tax at cosmetic counters everywhere.

Advertisement

FOR GUESTS—FOR GIFTS—FOR YOUR FAMILY'S SUMMER COMFORT

Cannon's most popular towels

Save on Cannon Glitter towels for gifts!
Luxuriously textured, wraparound large, with Cannon's exclusive Beauti-Fluff finish. Soft, washable metallic borders add glamour to any bathroom! One of several, now $1.69.

Save on Cannon Carefree colors that stay carefree!
Summertime means more towels in use, more to wash. Make sure you have plenty of rugged Cannon towels in Carefree colors that stay bright as new through wash after wash! Now $1.

Save on sturdy towels for extra summer baths!
Cheer your bathroom and your family with lots of gay Cannon stripes! They lap up water, dry fast, are a pleasure to use, give you years of beauty and wear. See many other wonderful Cannon stripes, now $1

SEE THESE AND MANY OTHER CANNON VALUES and sheets at savings now!

Save on gay, summer-bright percale stripes!
Only Cannon Percales are Combspun to give you so much beauty, comfort and long wear. Pastel stripes give your white sheets a lovely lift, make the beds so inviting! Striped, twin size, flat or fitted, about $2.98.

Save on fitted percales that need no ironing!
Cannon's Ezy-matic Corners slip on without mattress lifting, stay tucked, comfortably smooth. Sheets are strongly reinforced for extra long wear. Pastel, twin size, about $2.98.

Save on Combspun Percales for cooler sleeping!
Lightweight Cannon Percales feel cool, smooth. All are certified colorfast by the American Institute of Laundering. Lovely new Mountain Flower border on white, twin size, about $2.98.

NOW AT YOUR FAVORITE STORE

Cannon Mills, Inc., 70 Worth St., New York 13, N. Y. · Towels · Sheets · Bedspreads · Draperies · Stockings · Terry Cloth baby® HINTS COLLECTED BY MRS. DAN GERBER, MOTHER OF FIVE . . .

TRADE MARK REG. U.S.A. CANNON

bringing

TIPS FOR SUN-BATHING BEAUTIES. Summer is "a comin' in" and sun-bathing is in order for little beauties. A few tips for the soft-skinned set.

- Start with 2 minutes, divided fore and aft. Increase by 2 minutes each day. Do not exceed 30 minutes no matter how tan you think baby is.
- When you turn baby on his back, place him so his head is toward the sun, his eyes away from direct sunlight.
- Don't let baby get overheated. Put him where the air will help keep him from perspiring. The ground, with pad, is preferable to a carriage.

FEATURE OF THE MONTH. New "casserole" dish—designed to invite a small-fry appetite. Gerber Strained Macaroni, Tomato, Beef and Bacon combines vegetable, meat and cereal ingredients for brighter flavor and a variety of nourishing food values, including high vitamin-A value. Gerber Macaroni, Tomato, Beef and Bacon is mildly seasoned and has a smoothly pureed consistency that's especially pleasing to an unsophisticated palate.

OUTDOOR WARNINGS. (1) If baby takes an outdoor snooze in his carriage, be sure to park it in a shady nook. Sun beating down on a carriage roof can turn a baby's "little bedroom" into an oven. (2) Cover carriage with elasticized mosquito netting to protect baby from summer insects.

NUTRITION NOTE FROM DAN GERBER. "May I take a moment to tell you how we work in the interest of better nutrition for your baby? For example: Gerber Cereals play quite a nutritional role in your baby's diet, because they supply him with the proper amounts of iron and copper to help build good red blood. After years of research our laboratory developed an exclusive cereal formula containing a special form of iron which can be easily assimilated by infants. Our cereals also contain just the right amount of copper needed to make the iron work most effectively for your baby."

CHEER-UP DIVISION. Does your baby have a fussy spell about the same time every day? (Some babies seem to time it!) If so, it often helps to shift baby's bathtime to this cranky time. Water is a wonderful relaxer, and almost any kind of activity is a distraction. If it's inconvenient for you to bathe baby at this time, perhaps a change of scenery, say from nursery to living room, may help.

HAPPY MEALTIME DIVISION. Grins galore . . . that's usually the score at mealtime when you serve Gerber Strained Foods. Over 45 delicate, delicious varieties to keep baby interested and eager for his 3-squares a day. All are notable for eye-appealing colors, true-to-nature flavors and high retention of nutritive values—all prepared by baby food experts who specialize in quality.

Gerber

BABY FOODS

FREMONT, MICHIGAN

BABIES ARE OUR BUSINESS . . . OUR ONLY BUSINESS!

CEREALS · OVER 80 STRAINED JUNIOR FOODS, INCLUDING MEATS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 23

In well-equipped schools some time is given to exploring such "practical" subjects as cooking, sewing, baby care, typing, carpentry, metalwork, safe driving, because they will become a very real part of almost everyone's life. They can also be used, if well taught, to broaden understanding of the world and of ourselves.

Music and arts are a part of fine schools all over the world because they foster the development of the spiritual side of mankind which almost all civilizations cherish.

The best schools encourage students to form their own clubs, under teacher guidance, to pursue spontaneous interests in areas such as drama, a foreign language, cabinetmaking, stamp collecting or world affairs. The faculty doesn't merely tolerate these activities as outlets for youthful steam. They recognize them as genuinely educational in developing initiative and social self-discipline, as well as opening up fields of knowledge.

Good schools, especially in the higher grades, have programs in physical education and recreation, knowing that youth is a crucial time for physical, social and character development, knowing that sportsmanship, cooperation, sociability can't be taught by textbooks, but only by practice in life.

By the time we have listed all these nonacademic activities we may wonder where there is enough time in the schedule for English, foreign languages, history, science and mathematics. This particularly worries the critics who suspect there is too much softness. There has been widely quoted this year the complaint of a university president that a student recently applied for admission who in his last two high-school years had taken two English courses, one in history, and otherwise filled out his schedule with typing, speech, chorus, physical education, journalism, personality problems, and marriage and the family. I don't see anything unworthy in any of these subjects if well taught, and they might have been a logical combination if he was planning to be a secretary or to work on a newspaper without going to college. But I think he and his parents were awfully foolish to expect a college to accept him without a full complement of traditional academic subjects. Before we blame the school for being soft, though, we'd need to know what kind of curriculum advice the school actually gave him or whether perhaps he had tried academic subjects repeatedly and always flunked them.

It is a safer thing any time to follow a man's advice rather than his example.
JOSH BILLINGS

Of course athletics, recreation, hobby clubs usually come at the end of the afternoon, since no students are expected to study all day and all night. Others of the activities and classes I've listed are apt to be scheduled only once a week and the student won't take all of them each year. In other words, there is enough school time for a reasonable balance between academic subjects, practical subjects, human-relations discussions and recreation—a balance that will vary according to the student's aims—as the curriculum of any first-rate school will show.

I think you can see that my greatest disagreement is with those critics who assume that the training of the intellect is somehow separate from and much more important than other aspects of preparation for life, that practical subjects and human relations are not worthy of inclusion in a curriculum. The clearest example to me of the fallacy of this view is medical education. It has been known from the beginning of civilization that you can't make a good doctor with books and lectures alone. The student, in order to appreciate the meaning of the vital discoveries of the past, has to repeat the experiments himself in the laboratory. He has to learn the human body with his own eyes and hands in the dissecting room. He gets ideas about diseases from a

CONTINUED ON PAGE 143

Dr Scholl's SHOES

so kind to troubled feet

Sizes, Some Styles
2½ to 13
AAAAA to EEEEEEEE

So engagingly trim, too!

You'll quickly discover what real walking ease is like when you step out in your first pair of supremely comfortable, foot-flattering Dr. Scholl's Shoes. Made over Dr. Scholl's scientifically designed lasts, their glove-like, foot-cradling fit makes them ever so kind to your feet. No "breaking-in" discomfort.

Dr. Scholl's Shoes are made in all sizes for all types of feet. Expertly fitted at Dr. Scholl's Foot Comfort Shops in principal cities and selected Shoe and Department Stores. If not obtainable locally, write for catalog to Dr Scholl's, Inc., Dept. J68, Chicago 10, Illinois to be?

MOTHER

If you're bothered by heartburn and acid indigestion, try Tums. Tums gives total relief from excess stomach acids in seconds—and they're high in calcium. Convenient to carry in pocket or purse.

3 rolls 25¢

LIPS SORE?

EXTRA INCOME?

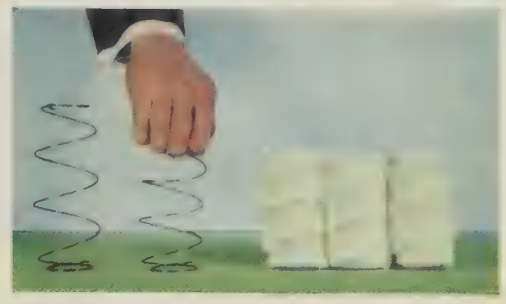
OF COURSE! Write to the address below and we'll send you details about a money-making offer. No obligation.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY, 1414 Independence Square, Phila. 5, Pa.

NEW BEAUTYREST!
NEW FIRMNESS! NEW YOU!

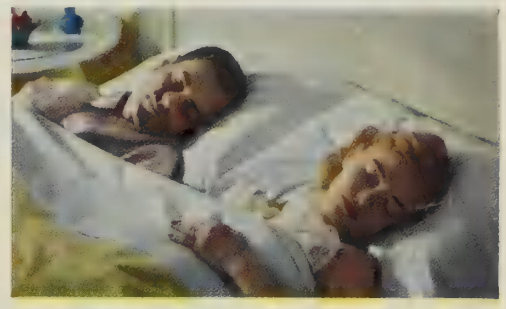
Added spring support gives new buoyant firmness! And this newest, most comfortable mattress actually costs least to own!

HERE IS COMFORTING NEWS for all who value their rest and their budget:



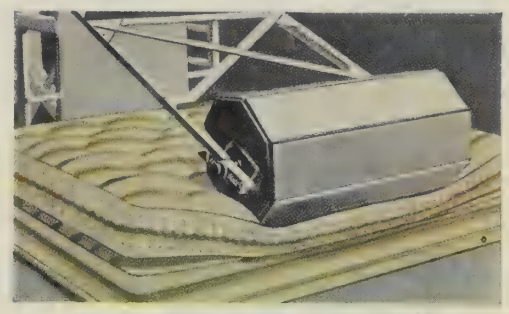
The world's finest mattress has been made finer, firmer—and designed to last longer and cost less than any mattress you can buy.

New power-packed springs are compressed . . . add 12% more buoyant firmness to the unique, all-new Beautyrest*.

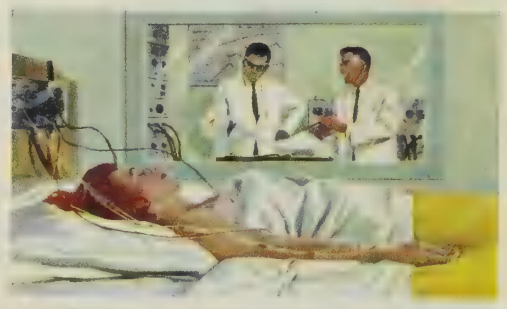


In torture tests made by the United States Testing Co., Beautyrest lasted 3 times longer than the next best mattress. So the best actually costs least to own!

Your choice of firmness! The new, firmer Beautyrest now meets all normal requirements. There's the Extra-Firm Beautyrest for those who need added support. Each only $79.50. Be sure to get a matching box-spring to bring out the best in your Beautyrest.



P.S. Beautyrest terms can be arranged as low as $1.50 per week.



New Beautyrest springs are power-packed by compressing into separate pockets. This adds 12% more buoyant firmness that pushes up under you.

Single-bed comfort in a double bed! Beautyrest alone has separate springs. The heaviest husband cannot disturb his wife's rest.

Longer lasting! Under the pounding of this U.S. Testing Co. roller, Beautyrest lasted 3 times as long as any of the 20 leading mattresses tested.

60,000,000 recordings showed sounder sleep on Beautyrest. This 11-year research used methods developed by the Sleep Research Foundation.

Wake up wonderful BEAUTYREST
by SIMMONS®

Makers of famous Hide-A-Bed® and new Back Care.
First mattress with a Built-in-Bedboard.

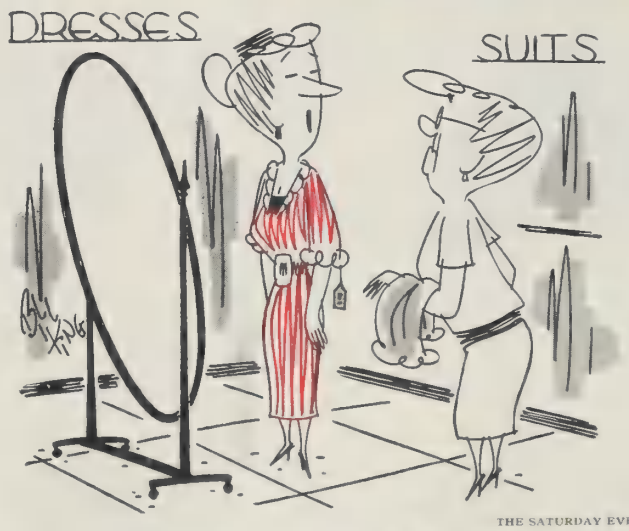
Prices slightly higher in Canada.

*Trade-mark Reg. U.S. Patent Office, Copr. 1958 by Simmons Co., Mdse. Mart, Chicago, Ill.

An ordinary mattress has about 200-300 springs. Wired together, they sag together. Not free to push up and correctly support the shape of your body. "Sag support" is bad for your back, comfort, and rest.

New Beautyrest mattress has over 800 separate springs. Like little "strong men," each spring is power-packed and free to push back and support your whole body with more buoyant, body-fitting firmness.

Looking for Something?



furniture, luggage, hearing aids, painters, plumbers, window shades?
whatever you need—
Find It Fast In The Yellow Pages
Advertisers displaying this emblem make your shopping easy.

UNDER COVER

By Bernardine Kielty

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

"My husband has very definite tastes. He can't stand me in anything over twenty dollars."

It doesn't happen so much to women, but reunions seem to undermine the self-confidence of men. Until they go back to their twenty-fifth reunion they think they are still boys. Then the blow falls. As one old grad told his wife—wistfully: "My classmates have all got so fat and bald they didn't even recognize me."

●

If you stay away from reunions, June is really a romantic month. It beckons. It stirs up the wanderlust.

PARIS SKETCHBOOK, by Ronald Searle and Kaye Webb, is a book for June. Pictures and text, it's for those who went to France long ago, because it shows that Paris never changes. And it's even more for those who may never get a chance to go, for it is Paris. (Braziller.)

SIENNA and Siennese Art, by Pierre du Columbier, is another alluring book. It is one of a lovely series, LES BEAUX PAYS, which includes Florence, London, Venice, Provence, Spain. ($8, Essential Books, Fair Lawn, N.J.)

●

THE BRIDGE IS LOVE, by Alma Mahler Werfel (Harcourt, Brace), is the intimate journal of a remarkable woman. From Vienna at the turn of the century, it reflects the avant-garde in art and music and literature, down to Hollywood and today.

The author is remembered by all who saw her in her younger days as a movingly beautiful woman. She had three husbands, all remarkable men: Gustav Mahler, composer and conductor; Walter Gropius, famous architect; and Franz Werfel, who among many novels wrote The Song of Bernadette. Her artistic judgment has proved flawless, and her influence has left its mark on writers, artists and musicians through half a century.

●

One of the most heart-warming and one of the most amusing novels I've read in a long time is SEIDMAN AND SON, by Elick Moll (Putnam). This is "the gentleman from Seventh Avenue," the Jewish dress manufacturer who has made good moneywise, but isn't sure that he has all the answers. He has son trouble, and partner trouble; his head salesman and his designer drive him crazy; the union is forever on his neck, and he has to placate the buyers. He tells his story in a spirit of contemplation—from a park bench, as it were—and in his inimitable Bronx accent, beside which all other New York dialects pale. Here are figures of speech to delight the soul, epigrams, philosophical double talk. It's a very funny book, but not a comic.

Seidman will probably join the long line of classic American characters, with Babbitt, Mama, Caspar Milquetoast, the Big Blonde, and all the others.

●

WILLIE MAE, by Elizabeth Kytle (Knopf), is another story with overtones of humor and underlying gravity. But this is not fiction. Willie Mae is a real woman, a colored houseworker from Georgia. She tells her story in her own words to a sympathetic employer who transcribes them faithfully. Willie Mae's family steps right off the pages, and her white employers, both the good and the savage, ought to know what she thinks of them. This is a unique book. There surely is only one Willie Mae.

●

At the opposite end of the spectrum is A NEW ENGLAND GIRLHOOD, by Nancy Hale (Little, Brown). Here the granddaughter of Edward Everett Hale looks back on her girlhood just outside Boston from the distance of a nearly middle-aged wife and mother now living in Virginia. Her memories will bring bright tears to the eyes of many a New Englander. They are charmingly written, but—being originally a series of scattered magazine pieces—need a bit of trimming.

●

Real old-timers will get a kick out of THE FATE OF THE MAINE, by John Edward Weems (Holt). In the exact, minutely detailed style of Walter Lord in his Titanic and Pearl Harbor books, this tells what happened to the battleship Maine in Havana Harbor in 1898. Perhaps the Spanish didn't blow her up after all!

■

Mystery fans have a gem in HEAT WAVE (Ballantine). It is more than a thriller. On page one a crime is committed, and the man who commits it is the hero of the story—an appealing figure, a younger David Niven, a less humorous Cyril Ritchard. It's a psychological tale on the order of Before the Fact, with the atmosphere of Brighton Rock—cold-blooded murder in the blandest of English seaside resorts. The author is Caesar Smith, a nom de plume if I ever heard one.

●

THE SPIRIT OF MAN, edited by Whit Burnett (Hawthorn), is a fine collection of writings that relate to the spiritual experiences of some forty persons, all of them famous in one way or another—Thomas Wolfe, William James, Thomas Merton, D. H. Lawrence, Helen Keller.

●

THE WINE PRINCES, by Margaret Mackay (John Day), is a good, sound historical novel of Portugal and the English wine growers, set in the beginning of the nineteenth century. In the distance Napoleon's troops are fighting for the peninsula, but in the town of Oporto life is completely absorbing, what with Portuguese aristocrats, formal but money-minded; and English businessmen, hard-headed in the wine industry, but oh! how susceptible to the warmth and the sun and the senhoritas!

●

June is the proper time to think about September. I don't know a better time to think about schools; or a better place to look into their present standing than SCHOOLS WITHOUT SCHOLARS, by John Keats (Houghton, Mifflin). For parents, teachers, educators and all thoughtful citizens.

The Army is also getting excited about education. In some handsome free pamphlets it describes the opportunities, particularly for high-school graduates who cannot go to college. Here are a few: IT'S YOUR DECISION, for high-school students; RESERVED FOR YOU, about technical-training chances; PATHWAY TO MATURITY, for parents; MILITARY GUIDANCE IN SECONDARY SCHOOLS, for teachers. You get them at any Army recruiting station, or from the Adjutant General, Dept. of Army, Washington 25, D.C., attention: A.G.S.N.

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

"I often wonder how I made out in that intelligence test they gave us."

You get a Cleaner Wash with CLOROX®

Whitest and Brightest!

You add extra cleanliness to your wash every time you add Clorox to your washday suds. White cotton, linen, nylon and rayon come out extra white . . . extra clean! Colorfast cotton and linen come out extra bright . . . extra clean!

Clorox does a better job of bleaching and stain removing than any other type of washday product on the market. If you want the cleanest wash you can get, you want a wash that's Clorox-clean!

Safest for Health!

Ultra-refined Clorox sanitizes, too! No other bleach . . . no other laundering product . . . equals Clorox in germ-killing efficiency.

Every time you launder with Clorox you protect your family's precious health!

KEEP AN EXTRA BOTTLE HANDY FOR HOUSE CLEANING!

CLOROX®

© 1958, The Clorox Company

I dreamed I was a midsummer night's dream in my new *maidenform bra! I'm bewitching...and the magic is all maidenform! It's new Twice-Over† Six-Way*, a beautiful blend of comfort and curves...the bra that stays up, stays put, stays perfect!

Here's why:

- Inside-secret bands of elastic to give you a gentle grip that can't possibly slip!
- Double-elastic sides for easy give-and-take—you've never known such comfort!
- Double-stitched cups of silky broadcloth for curve-control where it counts!
- Light-and-airy foam-rubber lining to make the most of every curve you own!
- Changeable six-way straps adjust to stay secret under your every neckline!

White cotton broadcloth in sizes A, B, and C cup 5.95

Look for Twice-Over Six-Way in this colorful package.
And ask for a Maidenform girdle, too!

1958 MAIDEN FORM BRASSIERE CO., INC., NEW YORK 16, N. Y. *REG. U. S. PAT. OFF. †PAT. PEND.

Divorced—but still in love with him. What should she do?

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.
Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

AN EX-WIFE'S DILEMMA

Not uncommonly, a divorced couple settle their differences and remarry. But it sometimes happens, especially after a divorce precipitated by another woman, that the husband seeks to renew the relationship with his former wife without the ceremony of remarriage. If the wife still loves her husband, this poses an agonizing dilemma.

"My husband is thirty-one, I am thirty, and our son and daughter are ten and six. Five months ago, after twelve years of marriage, he divorced me. I begged and pleaded for him not to go ahead, for I love him very much. But he said I never showed him any affection and he felt he was only a meal ticket; the house, the children, the pets, even my sewing and bridge came before him. I can see now that I did neglect my husband, but I couldn't then.

"No court would have granted him a divorce if I had contested it, but I was so hurt by his infatuation with a younger woman that I did nothing. (Her husband is overseas.) He made a very generous settlement, far more substantial than the court would have ordered.

"Since the divorce he's been seeing the other woman about once a week, but I don't believe anything will come of it. Seven weeks ago, instead of having the children visit him, he came to visit them. I can't pretend I wasn't glad to see him. He asked to come back the next day, and did, and he kissed me good night. I enjoyed it and encouraged him.

"Now he comes nearly every day. He helps around the house, has bought me a new car and insisted on giving us extra money. He always shows me affection and I return it. I don't feel guilty, for I don't believe in divorce and still consider myself married.

"He says he came back hoping we could make a go of it, but that nothing but his physical feeling for me has returned and that I would be better off without him. Yet he keeps coming, and I can't refuse him. I'm nearly crazy trying to figure it out. What should I do?"

The strain on this wife would be hard for any woman to bear under the same circumstances. She has reached the age when most women's sexual needs are at their peak. Their urgency and her loneliness may have more to do with her response to her husband than the real love she believes she feels.

The basic situation at the time of the divorce has changed very little. Husband and wife stopped living together then, they aren't living together now. He wanted a divorce then, he doesn't want a wife now. He was and is involved with the other woman. He felt guilty then (as the substantial settlement indicates), he feels guilty now. He bought his way out of marriage, and is using money to avoid remarriage.

The only possible change is that the wife now thinks she feels a vital love not present in her marriage. But this "love" may rest only upon emotional insecurity, maturing physical desire, and the habits and status acquired in twelve years of marriage.

This unhappy woman is not reckoning with the facts, nor is she properly evaluating the best interests of herself, her children or her former husband. Her behavior encourages him neither to leave her alone nor to marry her.

She must recognize that she is no longer a married woman in the eyes of the law, and her reputation is at stake as it would be for any other single woman. Moreover, her unwise behavior will reflect on her children as well as on herself.

She can continue to date her husband, but only under circumstances that would be considered acceptable for any other unmarried couple. Sexual intimacy should be ended, for reasons of self-interest as well as propriety. He says his only feeling for her is sexual desire. So long as their meetings are primarily for the purpose of gratifying that desire, there is little chance of developing the companionship so lacking in their marriage.

Unless companionship can be achieved, their second marriage would probably fail as did the first. If her association with her husband continues, it should be directed toward the sharing of common interests, common goals and plans for the children.

She should expand her own interests. Her need for her husband may arise from loneliness, boredom and a sense of futility, rather than from love. One way to make sure is to be active. She should seek opportunities to circulate among people, preferably including men. She is in a position to take part in community activities, cultivate special interests and hobbies, perhaps take a part-time job. Any or all of these steps should give her a new sense of purpose in life and help her appraise more objectively her true feelings toward her husband.

This wife's problem has become increasingly common as the divorce rate has risen, and is most painful when, as in this case, the wife did not want the divorce. But the divorce has taken place. The action that legally ended the marriage also fundamentally altered the personal relationship between the former husband and wife. Any attempt to resume the relationship without resuming the marriage is almost sure to lead to further heartache, for one or all concerned.

MAKING ROOM FOR HIS MOTHER

"Two months ago my father-in-law died, and without consulting me, my husband invited his mother to come and live with us. He felt it his duty, since his sister is not strong and is very busy with five children. Unless plans are changed, she will come as soon as the estate is settled, though she wrote she didn't want to come unless she was welcome.

"She is sixty-five, active and in good health. I like her all right, but I dread her joining our family. There will be complications for all of us, but our son and daughter are away from home most of the day in high school, my husband at his work. I am the one who will have to live with her.

"My husband says she can have his den, and since we have three other bedrooms, we can make room. She will have at least a hundred and fifty dollars a month income, and will pay us half for her expenses, so I have no real reason for refusing to take her in.

"But I do resent his asking her without talking it over with me. What stand do you think I should take?"

There aren't many choices. No doubt she could still refuse to take in her mother-in-law. But if she did (she obviously won't) she would disturb the entire family relationship, and grievously hurt both her husband and his mother.

She can passively accept her husband's plans and "make room" for his mother. But mere room in the house isn't enough; the mother-in-law needs to feel that there is room for her in the family, and that she is not just accepted, but welcome. Otherwise the situation will be tense and acutely uncomfortable for everyone, children included.

Quite possibly some arrangement can eventually be worked out that will suit the mother-in-law better than living with her son's family. But in view of what has already happened, it would be almost impossible to revise the plans now without irreparable damage to the relationship between husband and wife, husband and mother, wife and mother-in-law. Certainly it would be unwise to take any action that would make the husband feel disloyal or undutiful.

For the immediate future, then, this wife's best course seems to be to co-operate graciously in a decision she didn't help to make. Quite an order, since both she and her children are directly affected! But the circumstances of her husband's action do much to justify it. He extended his invitation during the two days he was away from home to attend his father's funeral. (The wife could not attend.) His reaction was quite natural in a grief-stricken situation.

If this wife can understand and appreciate her husband's feelings and motives, perhaps she can forget her grievance and concur in his decision as one she might have made herself. Then she will want to make the arrangement as comfortable as possible for all concerned. Undoubtedly, absorbing grandma into the household will require some changes in routine, some compromises and concessions for every family member. But the readjustments will produce less friction if they are anticipated, and if practical arrangements are planned in advance.

The first step is to talk the situation over with her husband, not critically, but to offer and receive suggestions on how best to accommodate the new member of the household. The children should share in plans affecting them. If their wishes must sometimes be overruled, they can accede more readily because they've had a hearing.

Living arrangements. Is the den actually the best spot for grandma? Perhaps one of the bedrooms would give both her and the family more privacy and independence. This is the time to decide.

Domestic routine. Will the present meal schedule suit grandma? If not, how can it be modified without upsetting the rest of the family? Perhaps she can prepare her own early breakfast, have a supper tray at her convenience in her own room.

Family facilities. Grandma may innocently appropriate her son's favorite chair, or settle herself in the sunroom where the grandchildren customarily bring their friends. Such complications can't be eliminated altogether, but they can be greatly reduced if grandma is informed ahead of time of the family's established habits. No doubt she will gladly agree to bring her own radio and television.

Finances. Grandma's contribution to the budget will probably more than cover her actual expenses. The family should agree in advance on how the balance will be handled. A fund might be started for family projects in which grandma would share, or small sums might go to the grandchildren in return for special services to their grandmother. (In cases where the grandmother is financially dependent, every effort should be made to distribute the burden as equitably as possible.)

Last but not least, the proposed arrangements should be explained to the grandmother in a friendly letter well ahead of time. Her comments and suggestions should be invited, and considered and acknowledged if offered. If the important questions are harmoniously settled in advance, minor matters can be readily adjusted as they arise.

ASK YOURSELF:

Am I Hurting My Daughter's Marriage?

It's only natural for a mother and her married daughter to enjoy talking things over. Though this practice is helpful up to a point, the mother must be on guard lest it be overindulged, leading to the daughter's undue dependence. These questions, honestly answered "Yes" or "No," may help you evaluate your influence on your daughter's marriage.

Do You:

1. Have a great deal of spare time?
2. Tell your daughter your troubles?
3. Visit her once a week or oftener?
4. Encourage her to bring problems to you?
5. Offer her good advice unasked?
6. Often extend special favors to her?
7. Think her husband somewhat immature?
8. See habits he should change?
9. Suggest ways she can influence him?
10. Agree with her criticisms of her husband?
11. Fear that her marriage will be unhappy?
12. Feel she married beneath her?
13. Defend her against his criticisms?
14. Feel she should tell you his secrets?

If your "Yes" answers exceed nine, you may not be acting in the best interests of your daughter's marriage. The average mother answers "Yes" to only five or six. You can be reasonably sure that you are not a disturbing influence if your "No" answers total eleven or more. You can adapt the questions to apply to your son's marriage. Review your "Yes" answers to see if you have unconsciously adopted some practice you would like to modify.

ERIN O'BRIEN co-starring in "GIRL ON THE RUN"

A WARNER BROS. PRODUCTION

another beautiful Lux Complexion

"... so gentle, so mild ... all those lovely pastels, white too ... and the way it softens your skin ..."

THAT'S THE BEAUTY OF LUX

Those are lovely Erin O'Brien's own words —on the subject of Lux. As a native of Hollywood, Miss O'Brien has used Lux for years. Its natural gentleness has kept her complexion soft and smooth.

Naturally gentle Lux can do as much for you. Its rich Cosmetic lather cleanses your skin thoroughly but gently. The Lux fragrance is very special, too—a blend of several costly perfumes. And now both complexion and bath size Lux come in four lovely pastels as well as white.

Used by more beautiful women all over the world than any other complexion bar, Lux is the proven beauty care. See how much it can do for you. Lever Brothers unconditionally guarantees complete satisfaction with Lux Soap or money back.

9 out of 10 Hollywood stars depend on Lux

Scientists used the most modern techniques in dental research to score a stunning victory over tooth decay

How "Decay Detectives" Track Down The Secret Of Fewer Cavities

BY MARGUERITE HIGGINS
Noted Journalist and Pulitzer Prize Winner

"That's certainly the biggest microscope I ever saw!"

The scientist smiled at my surprise. "That's an electron microscope, Miss Higgins. It magnifies 6000 times."

"We use it to observe the action of various decay preventives on tooth enamel," he went on. "For instance, we've found that the stannous fluoride in this formula makes teeth amazingly resistant to attacks of decay."

I asked: "That's the same fluoride formula in Crest Toothpaste, isn't it?"

"Right," was the answer. "The microscope showed us this formula worked well in the lab. So we put it into Crest Toothpaste and tested it in actual use. I believe you've seen the results of the clinical tests on Crest?"

I had indeed. These tests confirm that the scientists discovered a powerful new weapon against decay.

In one such test, conducted by a Midwestern university, children who brushed with Crest had 49% fewer new cavities than those who used ordinary toothpaste.

The reason, I was told, was that Crest strengthened soft spots on their teeth, and stopped them from turning into cavities.

In fact, many of the children who brushed with Crest had no new cavities at all. On the opposite page, Norman Rockwell has dramatized this joyous news—so heartening to every mother.

And the results for grownups were equally spectacular, as other tests proved. On the average, for both grownups and children, Crest cut cavities almost in half.

Truly, the "decay detectives" of modern science are closing in on Public Health Enemy No. 1—with the help of this new toothpaste, Crest.

* * * *

If you use Crest, you can make a simple test of its anti-decay ability—with the help of your dentist. Ask him to compare your cavity record before you started using Crest, with your cavity record since. You can see how much less decay Crest has meant for you.

WITH THIS GIANT ELECTRON MICROSCOPE, scientists examine the action of Crest with Fluoristan in protecting tooth enamel. In extensive "in-use" tests with thousands of grownups and children, Crest cut cavities almost in half.

A DENTAL HEALTH MESSAGE FROM PROCTER & GAMBLE, MAKERS OF CREST TOOTHPASTE

"Look, Mom—no cavities!"

Crest Toothpaste stops soft spots from turning into cavities—means far less decay for grownups and children. And Crest freshens your mouth—sweetens your breath.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Fluoristan is a trademark for Procter & Gamble's exclusive fluoride tooth decay fighter. ©1958, The Procter & Gamble Co.

The loveliest face loses its charm when it says

"Oh my feet"!

Corns
Callouses
Bunions

are among the worst offenders, says Dr. Scholl.

Make no mistake about it—painful corns, callouses and bunions can make you look as well as feel years older than you are.

To quickly stop this needless misery and threat to your looks—use thin, soft, soothing, cushioning, protective Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads.

1—Zino-pads give you fast nerve-deep relief... 2—Ease new or tight shoes... 3—Stop corns, callouses before they can develop... 4—Remove corns, callouses one of the quickest ways known to medical science when used with the separate medications included in every box.

Get a box today. At Drug, Shoe, Department, 5-10¢ Stores and Dr. Scholl's Foot Comfort® Shops everywhere.

Shape for Corns and Sore Toes.

Heart shape for Callouses, pain, burning here.

Special shape for Bunions, Enlarged Joints.

Special shape for Soft Corns between toes.

Dr Scholl's Zino-pads

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

On their round-the-world trip, the Millers pause beside the Sphinx for refreshment.

My Dream Girl adores those heated towel racks in European bathrooms: "Such a luxury!" Not that she wants towels toasted: wonderful racks to dry laundry if you travel on 44 pounds of luggage.

Spanish women are puzzled, beauteous Betty Aldrich confided in Madrid: If American men are so rich, they ask, why must millions of their wives work at jobs? (Haven't they heard of the American Way of Life?)

I hail Lebanon: land of milk and honey, Beirut the San Francisco of the Near East. And milk and honey is more healthful than what some tourists drink. (Wife, let's have some milk and honey when we get home!)

To impress my Lady Love, I ordered bouillabaisse à la Marseille in Madrid, a classic fish stew built around three kinds of shellfish and three kinds of fish. But mine contained clamshells and a fish head; she wasn't impressed.

"When I was in college," muses Betty Comfort, girlishly tossing a tennis ball at a rabbit in her garden, "my chum flaunted a bracelet with twenty bangles from twenty beaux. That's more fun than going steady."

One of our town's world travelers advised me to take along an old toothbrush, use it to launder my drip-dry shirt cuffs and collars. I tried it once, then began to blarney the maids with pesetas and piasters.

I've snapshots of my Gal of Sheer Delight posing in front of flower carts, blossom kiosks and floral sidewalk squatters in Madrid, Rome and Cairo. I can get more mileage out of her on a 25-piaster bunch of violets than from a 6000-lira dinner.

"I'll be sad when our P.T.A. days are ended," muses Peter Comfort, pottering at his son's chores. "Where else can I ogle young matrons whose oldest children are the same age as our youngest?"

I cite my wife's brilliant solution when somebody picked up my flight bag at Rome airport, walked off. Blue Pan-American plane bags all look alike, hundreds at every airport. She now ties her yellow hair ribbon around its handle.

Mediterranean auto drivers are bloodthirsty—all picadors, matadors, toreadors. They play the pedestrians avidly as bulls. I told one driver they ought to stick each other with beribboned darts for every near miss.

In each foreign land I bought my Dream Gal a bangle for her bracelet—Romulus and Remus in Rome, the Sphinx in Cairo. They kept making runs in her stockings.

We have seen bougainvillaea in Egypt, lilacs in Italy, pansies in Jordan; we vow never to be away from home in May and June. Our own back yard, the pasture beyond.

I must tip off our local restaurant to the trick of a Spanish maître d'hôtel: he tempted each diner with a trayful of raw steaks, chops and cutlets. (One American gourmet, female, waved 'em away scornfully.)

Our hard-worked diplomats complain Congress is rough on 'em. "Look," said one, "the British ambassador gets a new Rolls-Royce every year or two; all we get is a secondhand limousine bought from an undertaker."

I hate to disillusion myself, but our brethren from Madrid to Tehran and Hong Kong are often more efficient than we. Often my snapshots of the afternoon before (wife with Sphinx), turned in at noon, were delivered to our room by 6.

In the tomb of Vizier Mira Rockah, we found etched dozens of pictures of his Princess of Sheer Delight, all sniffing daintily at a lotus bloom. Career girl: best lotus sniffer on the Nile.

To the possible surprise of our Unitarian, Episcopal, Jewish and Christian Science friends, we had an audience with the Pope in Rome. He blessed small objects for them and our Catholic friends, and I don't know who'll be most astonished.

An airmail post card home often costs 20 to 30 cents; it can add up if you're the bragging type. Ordinary post cards you beat home and meet friends on Main Street who say, "I got a post card from you today!"

Around the Mediterranean, American powdered milk for kids is mixed in American washing machines. But to the dads and moms it could be from Russia, for all they know, we're so modest.

In one week I ate octopus cooked three different ways. (You can't get it at the country club at home.) My Guinevere shuddered; I could only tell her it tastes mildly like the almonds in chop suey.

After 25 years of absent-minded tolerance, I finally told the b.w. in Spain that she looks better with less rouge. She was astounded, but durned if she didn't leave it off a few days, conceded maybe I'm right.

Our youngest has gone fanatically hi-fi, and we promised to mail him a local phonograph record from each foreign stop. Some places this took more time than the sight-seeing.

I proclaim fearlessly: Every traveler must know 100 words of the lingo in each country. If he can't master 100, let him be content with 25. Or at least 10 words and an assortment of shrugs and gestures.

... When my daughter-in-law's descriptions of Harlan III at one year make me chuckle,

... Or our youngest's whimsey comes through clearly in a mid-ocean phone call,

... And my son-in-law congratulates me warmly on an old sports coat,

... Or young Patrick at four tells us over 1500 miles of wire, "I miss you!"

... And I tell foreigners proudly, "We're on our way to visit our son, a flier in Japan,"

... Or the b.w. fills out my landing card while I pound the typewriter in a downslanting airplane,

Then I tell myself, "Chum, you've had it; bachelors never become gramps."

NEW!

New Lustre-Creme Shampoo for shinier, easier-to-manage hair now at a special introductory price!

Debbie Reynolds starring in "THIS HAPPY FEELING" A Universal-International Picture. In CinemaScope and Color.

Debbie Reynolds knows there's a new reason why 4 out of 5 top Hollywood stars use Lustre-Creme Shampoo! It leaves your hair shinier than ever before and any hair-style is easy to set now after a Lustre-Creme Shampoo! Try it right away, while this special offer lasts!

Kraft gives you the HANDY SLICES with really rich cheese flavor!

Why do Kraft De Luxe Slices taste so much better than others you may find in the grocer's dairy case? . . . It's simple.

Kraft cheesemakers are very fussy about the natural cheeses from which they make these handy pasteurized process cheese slices.

For example, it takes fine natural cheddar cheese to give such flavor as you get in Old English brand. And only truly nut-sweet natural Swiss can make the Kraft De Luxe Swiss slices so good! That's why they are called Kraft De Luxe Slices.

That's why your cheese sandwiches taste so extra good when you use the handy slices marked Kraft. Try 'em all: American, Pimento, Old English brand, Swiss, Brick, and Muenster.

EIGHT GENEROUS SLICES
EIGHT FULL OUNCES

PUBLIC AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT
Edited by MARGARET HICKEY

STATE DEPARTMENT—CHAPELLES

A farmer of Ghaniwal village finds his work made easier with the improved plow developed by the Indian government. He is one of some 276,183,000 Indians who depend on the land for their living.

OLD WAYS YIELD TO THE NEW

...Report From Asia

USIS

Between sessions at the Red Cross conference Margaret Hickey chats with Gen. Alfred M. Gruenther, president, American National Red Cross, and Rajkumari Amrit Kaur, conference chairman and leader of the Indian delegation.

(Our Public Affairs editor, who is also a Governor-at-Large of the Red Cross, recently combined a tour of the Near and Far East with her mission to the International Red Cross conference in New Delhi. Her letter describing how people in these countries are working to build a better future for their children was so interesting we felt it ought to be shared with JOURNAL readers.—The Editors.)

Dear Bruce and Beatrice: The Persian carpets, dozens of them, spread out to cover the mud made it and the drenching rain of small concern when passengers left the Iranian royal train to visit a new maternal-health center to the north and near the Russian border. I had made the trip on this fabulous train—the royal family has two—with the dainty, shy younger sister of the shah, Princess Shams, her eager children, their dogs, and many ministers. (The five-year-old daughter, Princess Shahrezad, is very proud of her "Hello" and "Are you enjoying?") Princess Shams, who studied simple nursing while in the U.S. with the American Red Cross, proudly showed me shining new projects run mainly by volunteers.

From the shah's family down, a prodigious effort is being made to drive into the twentieth century with all speed. But black-robed women and thin-faced children remind one that the wealth of oil resources lifts the low standard of living to great luxury for only a few.

As do all visitors, I exclaimed over the luscious Persian melons and caviar. Other local favorites are pomegranate juice; yoghurt combined with nectarines; rice steamed to dryness and mixed with fruits or vegetables in pilaffs.

Modern daughters of ancient Persia are now becoming pioneers in helping their country achieve new standards of child care and maternal health. At Isfahan, city of beautiful religious mosaics, I drove with a volunteer "midwife aide" over the 450-year-old camel bridge (now buttressed to take motor traffic). We were on our way to the home of an expectant mother who—with the aide's help—is learning about hygiene and child care. After the baby is born, the aide will return to look after the other children while the mother regains her strength. There are 100 of these volunteers—each one trained to help a midwife bring healthy babies into the world.

In New Delhi, my next destination, I met General Gruenther, who headed our delegation of five from the American Red Cross, and spent fifteen exciting days attending sessions of the International Conference of the Red Cross, which convenes every four years. Here gathered representatives from East and West as one vast humanitarian body, holding itself above and aloof from politics. As a member of the Medico-Social Commission I made friends with people from Ghana, Iceland, Haiti, Lebanon, Burma, and talked about first aid, nurses' aides, accident prevention, blood transfusions, the spirit of nursing.

Sitting in front of me was the Red Cross director from Tadjikistan. He wore a quaint round black hat trimmed with white appliqué. "Health visitors," he told us, "should be the village's own people, trained to help each other, rather than wait for the authority to do for them."

This mutual helpfulness, I discovered, is widespread and takes many forms: in New Zealand, meals ðn wheels and a daily insulin run give elderly patients breakfast and medical treatment in their own homes; in Burma, a lay nursing order serves without pay; in Ghana's new society, schoolteacher Juliana Lawson travels by boat to a fishing village with a mobile teaching unit to "combat witch doctors' rumors." (I wish I could sing for you one of her rollicking songs filled with verses on health facts.) Red Cross provides clean water for the schools in Korea; a home-visiting committee in Ceylon; an effective arm of the civil defense in Sweden; a cottage hospital north of the Arctic Circle in Lapland.

One of the best opportunities for exchange of ideas came after the long hours of meetings and conferences in the festive Indian gardens. Here the intellectual and artistic life of India came alive in a setting of gay awnings and lattices draped with flowers and lights. After a song recital and poetry reading, Prime Minister Nehru and his daughter, Indira Gandhi, stopped to chat. All India, I sensed, worries about the day when his mantle must fall on a successor. Perceiving his daughter's quiet, persuasive charm, her feminine sensitivity and insight, I couldn't help thinking, might not she be that successor?

But one returns always to the destitute people whose only dormitory for the night is the hard pavement, padded with torn bits of matting for their babies and children. In the descending pink twilight of evening I saw long lines of people waiting for food. But at one end the lines were much shorter. These people, it seemed, with robes wrapped tightly around frail bodies to cover the ugly signs of leprosy, did not even enjoy the companionship of hardship. The crowds, oblivious, moved on; traffic was total confusion—bullock carts, buses, streams of village folk, children clinging to parents or riding pickaback. Farther on, at the bazaars, the "keen" of the snake charmer pierced the air, noisy film music blared forth. And at the booths some people stood and haggled, some quietly bought flower petals and incense for an offering at the

NEW!

from Betty Crocker to make your cakes fabulous

Cherry Fluff

Frosting Mix

There's never been a frosting mix like this before! Party-pink! Bright with red cherries! Thrifty—all you add is water!

The cherries are pre-crushed for you, and sealed in a special packet. No cooking — yet your finished frosting is the airy-light 7-minute kind. And, oh! that delicate cherry-almond flavor!

HAVE YOU TRIED ALL OUR BETTY CROCKER FROSTING MIXES?

CHOCOLATE FUDGE FLUFFY WHITE CHOCOLATE MALT PEANUT CREME

"I guarantee a perfect* frosting every time!" Betty Crocker General Mills

*PERFECT! For, every mix we make for you is guaranteed to come out perfect, or send the box top to Betty Crocker, Box 200, Minneapolis, Minn., and General Mills will send your money back.

temple. Newly constructed buildings in the diplomatic enclave contrasted strangely with the older, beautiful homes. The government-owned luxury hotels were air-conditioned, but didn't seem so comfortable as the old-fashioned bungalow types with their overhead fans.

Change is in the air, and hope too. Especially in the villages where the nation's battle for independence continues through government and private efforts to help people help themselves to a better life. I saw several village projects in the Nilokheri block in the Punjab, started with the help of Horace Holmes, program associate in the Ford Foundation's overseas development program, and S. K. Dey, minister of community development, an Indian businessman who gave up a prosperous career to head a team composed of men of many nationalities.

In the village of Bhanikhurd, the head of the panchayat (council of village elders) was on hand to greet the visitors. He pointed out to us the "bricked" street where once mud and refuse had offended the eye and nose. "We now have a sweeper to keep it clean," he announced proudly. Several new houses of concrete block with tiles have replaced the windowless adobe type. But it is in the fields where progress can be seen and felt, he emphasized. As a result of regular irrigation from the new tube well and much consolidation of the tiny bits and pieces of scattered farmlands, there is now a small surplus of agricultural products to be sold.

After refreshments we visited the blacksmith's factory under the trees where the smith—after a course at the nearby training center—is making improved farm implements.

The universe is full of magical things, patiently waiting for our wits to grow sharper.

EDEN PHILLPOTTS
A Shadow Passes
The Macmillan Company

Steel is hard to get, he explained, and he must pay back his government loan. But orders are coming in—he smiled—from farmers who want to use his new plow.

A lantern at the corner marked the adult reading class. After a busy day in the fields men and women sit together on the ground to learn to read the simple new books about seeds and implements. I was told that the village moneylender and the letter writer at first objected for fear of being put out of business, but now the latter helps with the class.

Most impressive of all is the school—now three rooms instead of the one I saw on my last visit, five years ago. The villagers themselves added those rooms at a cost of 6000 rupees. "People will make sacrifices for their children," the teacher told me. The mothers clustered around to ask questions and chat. "Ours is such a little school for so many children. How can we get more schoolrooms and another teacher?" No longer was the child, it seemed, considered just an extra work hand, but an extra mind to be trained for the future as well.

The hands of the clock are hurrying. Old ways yield to the new—and without doing violence to the traditions which have shaped the lives of people for centuries. The gram sevika—the village-level worker trained in home science—took me about to see the changes in housing and crafts and cottage industries. The gram sevika is proud of the model household with its smokeless chula (stove) and new latrine, but she is proudest of all of the Tuesday "home industry" meetings—when the women come to the center to sew, earning a rupee (about 21 cents) for six hours' work. The gram sevika helps the women use the improved spinning wheel, supervises them as they mend and make garments for small children, later to be sold at nominal cost to the villagers.

Planning is now going forward in the office of Dr. Rajammal P. Devadas, chief home economist in the Ministry of Food and Agriculture in New Delhi, to bring this kind of help

CONTINUED ON PAGE 42

Quick, easy before-dinner dainties!

HORS D'OEUVRES AMERICAINE

DEVILED EGGS: Hardboil eggs, split lengthwise and remove yolks. Mash yolks with mayonnaise and onion juice, salt & pepper. Sprinkle in Herb-Ox Instant Bouillon and Seasoning to taste.

CREAM CHEESE CELERY STUFFING: Soften cream cheese with heavy cream. Add finely chopped celery & onion, salt & pepper. Sprinkle in Herb-Ox Instant Bouillon and Seasoning, whip until smooth. Garnish with paprika.

PATÉ SURPRISE: Mash liverwurst with mayonnaise into ■ smooth paste. Add ■ dash of Worcestershire sauce, onion juice if desired. Sprinkle in Herb-Ox Instant Bouillon and Seasoning. Chill and serve on melba toast or crackers.

FREE SAMPLES of New Herb-Ox Instant Bouillon and Seasoning. Write: Pure Food Company, Inc., Dept. LHJ, Mamaroneck, N. Y.

Made by makers of famous Herb-Ox Bouillon Cubes.

Herb-Ox

INSTANT BOUILLON AND SEASONING

Wanted: You!

IF YOU want extra money and have spare time to put to use, this is for you! You can spend your spare time taking orders for magazine subscriptions—and earning generous commissions.

Just send us your name and address on a postal card. In return, we will send you our offer with starting supplies. From then on, YOU are the boss. Subscription work of this type can be carried on right from your own home. As an independent representative, you may work whenever it is most convenient for you.

Write that card today. Information and supplies are sent at no obligation to you.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
355 Independence Square, Phila. 5, Pa.

ENJOY "Constant Comment" TEA

At Food Gift & Dept. Stores

fine Ceylon tea with bits of oranges and sweet spice added. "Constant Comment" is the richest, liveliest, most deliciously different tea you've ever tasted. With your family, — your friends — enjoy "Constant Comment" daily.

For 6 cup sample, send 10¢ to C. Bigelow, Inc., Mfrs. Merwin St., Dept. L-Jn Norwalk, Conn.

TOGETHER

Tasty idea for tonight... real Italian-style
CHEF BOY-AR-DEE® Spaghetti and Meat Balls

njoy tender, firm spaghetti... plump beef meat balls... rich red sauce—ıst as served in Venice. Yours for the heating. You'll notice youngsters need o coaxing when this good-for-'em dish is on the menu! It costs bout 14¢ a portion. Look for the 2-serving can or economical 5-serving size.

Now available in Canada

Can you tie this?

You certainly can . . . with airy

Decorette®

the ribbon that makes the "Magic Bow"

Double Magic!

For a delightfully feminine gift wrap, use light 'n' lacy Decorette Ribbon to make this "Magic Bow" (directions are on every roll of Sasheen®, Decorette, and Magic Bow® Brand Ribbons). Twice as nice: center a Sasheen "Magic Bow" on another of Decorette. And what wonderful colors—ice cream pastels, gleaming gold and silver, dark tones. Look for them!

"Magic Bow" and method of making patented U.S. Pat. No. RE. 23835 © 3M Co.

MINNESOTA MINING AND MANUFACTURING CO.
. . . WHERE RESEARCH IS THE KEY TO TOMORROW

3M COMPANY

Now! You can make perfect gravy, brown and delicious every time!

KITCHEN BOUQUET DOES IT!

So easy! Just follow the tempting gravy recipes in the folder you will find in every Kitchen Bouquet package.

Result: Perfect gravy—brown and delicious every time!

Kitchen Bouquet—a favorite of good cooks and chefs for over 80 years—does so much, costs so little!

KITCHEN BOUQUET is a magic blend of 13 garden vegetables, herbs and spices

And to get that wonderful charcoal-broiled effect in your kitchen range, brush Kitchen Bouquet on steaks, broilers and fish before broiling.

FOLDER in package tells you many ways to win praise with KITCHEN BOUQUET to many more Indian villages. Almost 25 per cent of the nation's nearly 600,000 villages now are included in this community development—and there is hope that by 1961 the program will blanket the entire country.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 40

Near Lucknow, a beautiful little community called Literacy Village by its founder, Welthy Fisher, has grown up. An American woman, Mrs. Fisher spent most of her life in China and India.

After the death of her husband, who was a Methodist bishop in Calcutta, Mrs. Fisher searched for a way to use her knowledge and love of Indian people. This community is the result of her search. A $69,000 grant from the Ford Foundation has enabled her to bring Indian teachers here to prepare to teach in the villages; women of Greenwich, Connecticut, have given a simple little chapel for meditation and study. Bright of face, Mrs. Fisher walks firmly and quickly. It is difficult to believe that she is in her seventies and starting a whole new career.

I drove back to New Delhi with Douglas Ensminger, Ford Foundation representative in India, and was amazed by his almost encyclopedic knowledge of community development. He talked about the practical steps needed to effect "the uprooting of sorrow," which Gautama Buddha preached many years before the Christian era.

As we drove we saw so much still to be done. To get water, people worked with a Persian wheel, as did their ancestors. In village after village the only illumination at night came from wicks glowing in little oil holes in the ground. Only occasionally did we see an electric light in a little factory. Horace Holmes, Mr. Ensminger told me, is returning to India with a team of American engineers and plans for new small generators to be made in the villages at a moderate price.

A week later my jeep bounced over the deep ruts of the jungle road along the Wakong River in Cambodia, past teakwood trees and lush foliage. Pink flowers, such as wild roses and water hyacinths, lined the dark mossy forest. The piercing cries of birds and the hum of insects came from the jungle as we passed a clinic, identified by its Red Cross symbol, high on stilts. Later we stopped for a school bus picking up small, plump, smiling children, and followed by the teacher riding behind on a bicycle and carrying a white umbrella.

Flowers, papaya trees and banana palms with fruit of the small sweet variety filled the yards around the native houses of bamboo matting. Nearby, water buffalo and their calves munched on green leaves. Everywhere there were pools of water on the ground, and frequent drenching rains added to them. The village housewife, pleasant and capable, rises early and fixes food for her husband and children, packing the school lunches in coconut shells. Then she cleans the hut, feeds the animals and often joins her husband in the rice paddies.

I saw Angkor Vat by evening, glowing red in the fire of the setting sun. The surrounding city of temple mountains was built a thousand years ago at about the time of the Crusades in Europe and today covers an area of four square miles. Some fifty years ago French archaeologists and engineers began restoration of these ancient monuments long lost to the steaming jungle. By daylight a watery curtain of blistering sunshine makes even more beautiful and exotic the great edifices which dominate a whole city of grandeur. The central tower of Angkor Vat rises to approximately the height of Notre Dame de Paris. Between Siem Reap, the village near the Angkor ruins, and Phnom Penh, the modern capital of Cambodia, there are smaller monuments made of bricks highly polished and joined by a powerful unknown binder.

When I returned to Bangkok, Chanda, my helpful guide, had arranged for me to stay at the lovely new Erawan Hotel, named for the three-headed elephant I had seen carved so delicately in the monuments of ancient Angkor. In my air-conditioned bedroom was an orchid in a silver vase from the garden of the Princess Marayat, who remembered me from my visit five years before. Outside was a spirit house which the room boy filled with flowers to gladden the spirits who come to protect the smiling visitor.

The next day I called at the office of Sam Keeny, regional director of UNICEF, the fund that has helped so many of the world's children. Supported entirely by voluntary contributions from governments and private citizens of 80 countries, UNICEF (with the co-operation of other U.N. agencies and local governments) is now bringing medicine, food and the skill of trained health, nutrition and sanitary workers to more than 40,000,000 children every year. What better example of the power of "diplomacy of the heart"? More tender loving care—that's what the whole world needs most in its struggle for a happy survival.

Always,
MARGARET

REFERENCE Library

DAILY FOOD GUIDE

Do you ever say, "What shall I make for dinner today?" You want to plan healthful meals, well proportioned nutritionally. Our booklet, the DAILY FOOD GUIDE, will help you. It lists the foods needed every day, tells you how much is needed, what foods to choose from, and how to use them in your menus.

To order, ask for No. 1785, and send 10 cents to: Reference Library, Ladies' Home Journal, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania.

Chiffon...sheer pie delight

Now make it in 4 minutes with Jell-O Chiffon Pie Filling

NEW LOVE STORY IN PIES! Here's a luscious, strawberry dessert that you can whip up in minutes.

NO COOKING! All you do is add water and sugar to Jell-O Chiffon Pie Filling. And beat.

YOU CAN'T FAIL! Thousands of tests in the General Foods Kitchens prove you can't make a mistake if you try. We guarantee it.

TOPPING TIP: Top Strawberry Jell-O Chiffon Pie with whipped cream and fresh strawberries. Enjoy Lemon Jell-O Chiffon Pie, too. At your grocer's—cost pennies.

JELL-O IS A REGISTERED TRADE-MARK OF GENERAL FOODS CORPORATION

New Palmolive gives

New Life to Your Complexion Safely... Gently!

Palmolive's Rich Lather Contains –

No drying detergents!

No harsh perfumes!

No irritating deodorants!

You can give your complexion new life—leave it softer, fresher—with New Palmolive care!

And you'll see results after just a few days—as New Palmolive care gently washes away dirt and make-up . . . cleanses so effectively it actually gives your complexion NEW LIFE!

New Palmolive's rich, mild lather lets you cleanse far more thoroughly than you'd dare to do with harsher soaps. Palmolive contains no drying detergents, no strong perfumes, no irritating deodorants—just the gentlest of natural cleansing ingredients. So get that "new life" look with gentle New Palmolive Soap!

All New! lather fragrance color wrapper

JOURNAL ABOUT TOWN

EDITED BY: JEAN ANDERSON - ABBOT MILLS - EILEEN SHARPE - GLENN MATTHEW WHITE

50 years ago in the Journal

In June, 1908, white summer dresses were high-necked and long-sleeved, and trimmed with Venetian ladderwork jabots, Irish lace bows and piqué four-in-hands. Henry Ford put a luxury six-cylinder car on the market; the price: $2800. In Chicago the Republican Convention nominated William H. Taft for President: in Princeton, Grover Cleveland died: and George Arliss was a hit on Broadway in The Devil.

"We must retrench," writes Mrs. Rorer in the June, 1908, JOURNAL, referring to the widespread depression. She then tells JOURNAL readers how to use celery tops, cheese rind and poultry feet, lemon and orange rinds and eggshells.

The Girl Who Works: "A small ironing board, a sleeve board, a washbasin, a small gas burner to heat water, two irons, bluing, a bit of wax and a package of starch will allow the stenographer who lives in a hall bedroom to keep her waists as dainty as can be."

"What shall I do about letting my children wear socks in the summer?" a mother wants to know. "Stockings are quite as comfortable and far safer," answers Doctor Coolidge.

"To set the color in new wash material, dissolve an ounce of sugar of lead in a gallon of boiling water and soak the garment in this for one hour. Remember that unless the lead is thoroughly dissolved it will leave greasy streaks in the material that nothing known will ever remove."

"Passing the fork from the left to right hand at each mouthful looks exceedingly awkward," writes Traveler. "Quite right," agrees Mrs. Kingsland. "A provincial custom . . . a misdirected effort to be very elegant."

"Is it proper for a young man to sit on the arm of my chair if the room is crowded?" asks Puella. "Extremely ill-bred," replies Mrs. Kingsland. "He should stand before you."

During a recent antique show (100,000 visitors) our decorating department's Cynthia Wheatland and Corinna Wildman decided to have treasures appraised for $1, a special-event offer with funds going to charity. Cynthia brought from home a faïence Chinese lion that guards her fireplace, Corinna a Staffordshire lady lion tamer. "We're seeing a hundred items a day," said the appraisers. "Jewelry, enamels, paintings, diaries, rare china, odd bits from attics, and even Spanish lace from pianos. One woman brought in a bronze statue of Napoleon she insisted had been in her family for 200 years—we're convinced her ancestors must have used a crystal ball! And one woman brought in an old bathtub, told us we didn't really appreciate its sentimental value, and marched it home again to grow flowers in it."

ABBOT MILLS

Corinna and Cynthia at the antique show—appraisals for $1.

Because this is the month more bachelors become bridegrooms than any other, we dropped in on the man a million girls would marry in a minute—given the chance: Tony Perkins, who's captivating women of all ages as the gangling, youthful Tom Wolfe in "Look Homeward, Angel." What kind of girl would Tony marry? "What kind of girl would any man marry?" he tossed the question right back at us. "Just a nice, simple, attractive, intelligent girl. Certainly not an actress!"

FRIEDMAN-ABELES

Tony Perkins stars in "Look Homeward, Angel."

We've been seeing a lot of red recently. Specifically, red hair. Do you know that New York has a Redhead Research Institute? Sitting self-consciously in a roomful of redheads, we learned that we (brunettes) are out of style. New York is a city of redheads. You don't have to have naturally red hair. Any rinse will do. One office building here hires redheaded elevator operators only. We asked Fashion Editor Wilhela Cushman about red hair. "It's popular," she admitted, "and lovely." More deflated than ever, we took a count around the workshop. Brunettes: 48. Blondes: 17. Redheads: 4.

It isn't unusual for editors to travel coast to coast, border to border covering stories. But when Betty Coe Spicer stopped by to say she'd flown 50,000 miles last year writing 50,000 words, we wondered what she did while she was up in the air. "Wrote part of a murder mystery," she said, "called The Deadly Doll." She writes mysteries in collaboration with her husband, Bart Spicer, under the name Jay Barbette.

June is still the marrying month (news to anyone?). But did you know that the two "marryingest" states are Nevada and New Mexico? The "unmarryingest"? Delaware and North Carolina.

Hugh Kahler likes to talk about JOURNAL stories that have become big movies over the years: Oscar-winning "Rebecca"; "Song of Bernadette"; "Good Morning, Miss Dove"; "Blackboard Jungle"; and now "Ice Palace," Edna Ferber's novel currently appearing, is in movie production. So when we heard that "His Old Sweethearts," a short "parlor play" printed in a 1909 JOURNAL, was a hit in Raleigh, North Carolina, we went to the library and read it. It's the story of an about-to-be-married bachelor who receives a puzzling note from one of his old flames, one who has been married twice. Trying to figure which of his sweethearts could have sent it, he dreams of them all. And they, in turn, appear center stage, costumed and framed in gilt. "It's the best thing we've ever done," says Mrs. L. P. Kennedy*, who directs the Raleigh Woman's Club cast. Apparently the play's easy to do. No lines to learn. No costumes to buy (you can get them out of an attic trunk). All you need are a few props, pretty girls and a* man who reads well. (If you'd like to do the play, send for a script.)

LAWRENCE WOFFORD

Stars in "His Old Sweethearts."

Note to brides: Your chances for celebrating a golden anniversary in June, 2008, are just twice as good as for couples who married 50 years ago and are celebrating this month.

Can you break ice with a bracelet? Anywhere, Dolly Ann Seixas told Dawn Norman*. The secret is a hobby bracelet—a token of sentiment. As wife of tennis champ* Vic Seixas*, Dolly wears a set of tennis charms including racket, Davis Cup miniature, and some of her husband's trophies strung along three gold chains. Curious, we wondered who else wore her heart on her sleeve, or wrist.* Louella Shouer's bracelet carries a gold egg beater, an ice-cream cone and other food items. And the editorial bracelet of Beatrice Gould embraces not only her wrist but every department in the magazine. On it: a camera, telephone, toaster, artist's palette, pencil, bubble bath, rotisserie, high-heel slippers, washing machine, a Swiss chalet, a green thumb—and an aspirin box, presented by her husband.

ABBOT MILLS

Dawn Norman, Dolly Seixas talk bracelets

THE CARRIAGE WAS WHERE SHE HAD LEFT IT
UNDER THE LILAC HEDGE—BUT THE BABY WAS GONE.

FACE OF THE TIGER

IT WAS ALL BEGINNING AGAIN—
THE FEAR, THE COLD TERROR—AND THIS TIME
THERE WAS NO ESCAPE.

By URSULA CURTISS

"Now you're being a good girl, Dolores," said Max, breathing hard and dropping his upraised hand. "Now you're being smart. Just so long as you know who's boss ——"

Dolores, who had turned her head rebelliously away, turned it slowly back again with the melting gaze that was a reproach in itself. Max muttered uncomfortably, "Don't like to knock you around," and the scene between them ended as it always did, with an awkward and tentative caress.

Dolores accompanied him to the gate as usual. As Max lifted the latch she quickened, thrust her head forward and opened her mouth hungrily, exposing a quantity of long businesslike yellow teeth. Baby teeth, the vet had said confidently.

Max slid nimbly through the corral gate, fastening it behind him, and walked rapidly toward the long terraced white building behind an oval sweep of driveway. The day at the Coastline Club had officially begun.

Early as it was, the kitchen crew had preceded Max by an hour, leaving their quarters in the big dark green-painted annex and cutting across the golf course in direct contravention of Major Soames' orders. But the major had not been awake at six o'clock since his bassinet days, and they were safe enough with Max McIntosh, bellboy and general factotum.

The kitchen was busy, apart from the routine preparation of breakfast. There was to be a women's-club luncheon, and the vegetable men were already reducing carrots and radishes into shapes suitable for clubwomen's luncheons.

Albert, the chef, noted Max's entrance without glancing at the door. Still without looking around, he reached for a giant coffee urn, poured a cup and set it down. Max picked it up, carried it to the small table where the chef had breakfasted earlier.

The telephone rang. Max, who was nearest, lifted the receiver and then jerked his head at one of the waiters, who began hastily to assemble the major's breakfast on a tray: honeydew melon, two-minute egg, whole-wheat toast with strawberry preserve, a pot of coffee. Max inspected the tray critically when it was ready, and said, "I'll take it up myself."

The clubhouse, at eight o'clock still holding the night's coolness and shadows, came to life gradually by way of the switchboard, the stairs, the dining room.

To Lou Fabian, who had been working as a secretary's secretary for only two weeks, it was like being the first one down in a country house, surrounded by the peculiarly off-duty atmosphere of flowers no one else was looking at, chairs no one was sitting in. Then the first little orange light flickered on the switchboard: Mrs. Damon, in Cabin 11, wanting to talk to the local diaper service. Moments later a sleepy voice on the stairs said, "I told you you were getting too much sun yesterday, just look at you," and an answering voice said amusedly, "Me! Look at you."

Lou, who couldn't see either of them, took paper and carbon from the bottom drawer of her desk, and began to type the day's lunch and dinner menus. She was interrupted by a rattle from the switchboard, and this time it was Mrs. Gifford, in Cabin 6.

Mrs. Gifford's voice poured so affrontedly out of the receiver that Lou missed the first part of the complaint. It wound up with a demand for a heater at once: "These mornings are chilly, Miss Fabian, particularly in here under the pines. And damp; and as you know, my daughter is delicate."

About like a water buffalo, Lou thought. She said, "I see, Mrs. Gifford. I'll speak to Max about it just as soon as he comes in, and if ——"

"It isn't a question of if," said Mrs. Gifford menacingly, "it's a question of when. I know Major Soames is a busy man, and I wouldn't like to have to bother him personally about a heater, but I must safeguard my child's health. If it were for myself ——"

Lou made appropriate promises—things were always promised readily at the Coastline Club—and hung up.

Although her job here was only two weeks old, she had already learned that Mrs. Gifford was the kind of guest without whom no resort is ever complete, and with whom nothing was ever quite as it should be. She would always be too hot or too cold—if she hadn't requested a heater it would have been an electric fan—and there would never be enough towels to suit her. CONTINUED ON PAGE 95

THE JOURNAL'S
COMPLETE-IN-ONE-ISSUE CONDENSED NOVEL

© 1958 by Ursula Curtiss
FACE OF THE TIGER is soon to be published in book form by Dodd, Mead & Co.

By ETHEL EDISON GORDON

Here they were at the railroad station and still she could not get Mrs. Farnsworth started toward her train; she didn't want to seem to rush her, but probably Mrs. Farnsworth would never have noticed, she was still so excited.

"How that house does tempt me!" said Mrs. Farnsworth for the tenth time. She sighed. "But five thousand more than we should spend, my husband wouldn't hear of it. If only he didn't have to leave tomorrow, and this is going to be a long trip, six weeks at least, and he wants me moved over before he gets back —— I wonder if I could still catch him at the office ——"

"Naturally you wouldn't want to commit yourself without his seeing it," she said, one eye on the clock over the station. Mrs. Farnsworth registered alarm at the thought, and Phyllis went on quickly, "Actually that other house is a marvelous buy, and your husband did like it enough to tell you to go ahead with it."

"But it doesn't compare to the Wilson house," said Mrs. Farnsworth reproachfully.

"No, in many ways it doesn't," admitted Phyllis, ruing the rash moment when she had driven past the Wilson house and mentioned that it was for sale, just when Mrs. Farnsworth had a check in her handbag for one of the new development houses on the ridge. "But it is over your budget, and that's why I didn't show it to you before, and it is an old house —— I'm afraid you're going to miss your train."

"It will only take me a second to dash across when it stops," said Mrs. Farnsworth, her brow wrinkled. "If I could get him to come back with me tonight, convince him it's worth the trouble to see ——"

"Here's the train now," said Phyllis, grateful that it was on time. She had five minutes to race two blocks to Sanger's and pick up the pencil box before the store closed; Go! she prayed to Mrs. Farnsworth, and Mrs. Farnsworth reluctantly got out of the car.

"I may phone you tonight," called Mrs. Farnsworth as she ran along the platform.

"I won't be in tonight," she shouted back over the sound of her motor. Had she heard her? It didn't matter. The light was with her and she shot across the street and over to Cedar and braked in front of Sanger's just as Mr. Sanger was locking the front door.

"Please, Mr. Sanger?" she entreated. "I wouldn't ask you if it weren't so important, honestly."

He shook his head at her. "Well, since it's you ——" Still shaking his head, he unlocked the door again and switched on the lights. "Don't you ever know when it's time to quit work and go home?"

"I'm on my way there now," she said. "I just couldn't get rid of my last client. It's that pencil box in the window I want, the one that looks like a rocket."

He gingerly pulled it out. "Don't tell me your baby is old enough for pencil boxes."

"My baby indeed!" she said. "My baby happens to be four years and eleven months old and he's starting kindergarten tomorrow."

"You don't say," said Mr. Sanger. "Gift-wrap this?"

"If it isn't too much trouble. It's going to be quite an occasion in the Berry house."

"So that's why Mr. Berry bought the briefcase," he said. "Since when do they need briefcases and pencil boxes in kindergarten?"

She laughed. "I don't suppose they do, actually. But ——"

"Sure, I know," he said. "Everything is an occasion when there's only one youngster in the family."

But not for long, his glance told her, and she colored a little at it: four more months till the baby came. She thanked him, and took her package, and the extra box of crayons Mr. Sanger had included for Eddie, thanked him again for opening the shop for her, and eased herself in behind the wheel. Five minutes to get out of downtown traffic, another five minutes up the hill, and then you could just see their red house sitting high on its green plot with the new young trees barely screening it; up the driveway, and there were Sam and Eddie waiting on the breezeway.

"I'm going to take only one minute," she called, running toward them, not so nimbly as she might have once, but not bad, considering. "How's my boy?" she said, hugging him, standing up to kiss Sam. "Don't you both look spruced up!"

"Bertha said I could put on my new shoes," said Eddie, admiring them.

"And your new blazer, too, I see!"

"You have half a minute left," said Sam. "Get going."

"I wouldn't keep you waiting this evening for the world," she said, making for the screen door, heading directly for her bedroom. Bertha had been polishing furniture today: there was a smell of wax, and a fat and shapeless bouquet of their brilliant zinnias was reflected as in a mirror on the dresser top. She would have enjoyed rearranging them, she would have enjoyed just sitting back and looking at her pretty bedroom, and she certainly would have enjoyed a shower, but no time for that; time only to wash her face and comb her hair and change her shoes, and a stolen moment to pause and glance through the window at their bright garden and their pretty new chairs grouped on the terrace. One of these days we must sit on them, she thought wryly: where had the summer gone to? The telephone was ringing; she turned from the window.

"I'll take it," Sam called. A moment later, "For you, Phyl. The boss."

She picked up the extension on the night table. "What's up, Fred? Not my Mrs. Farnsworth?"

"Your Mrs. Farnsworth. She didn't take the train back to New York. She reached her husband at his office and he's going to meet her out here and take a look at the Wilson house. She'd like you to go with them."

"But I told her I'd be busy tonight." She heard Sam's step outside and she looked up and made an exasperated face at the telephone. "Fred, we promised Eddie to take him to the beach tonight. He's starting school tomorrow, and we wanted this to be a special night ——"

"You won't keep him out much later than nine, will you?"

CONTINUED ON PAGE 140

Phyllis told herself that probably Eddie had gone to sleep happily enough without her.
But tonight it didn't work.

Phyllis was so sure her career hurt no one.

Then Sam said, "I was wondering if you'd don

Child Lost
the right thing. For yourself-not for Eddie and me".

VLADIMIR

What daughter believes her mother was vulnerable once, and foolish? What mother can admit it?

The Journal Presents
LOUISE PFAFFMANN
HER FIRST APPEARANCE IN ANY MAGAZINE

They were five minutes early and the train was ten minutes late; a quarter of an hour to wait, then, in that smelly little glassed-in shelter across the tracks from the station.

I wonder if I'll even recognize the old girl when she steps off the train, Mrs. Brogden thought, and it was like going under for the third time. If you remembered your life in a flash, you wouldn't stumble over all the stupid details, would you? Stuff you hadn't touched in years, that you didn't even know was there any more; like Vladimir, for heaven's sake?

Beside her, Ann shrugged the hood of her storm coat back to show the tousled Italian haircut, so terribly unbecoming. Her nose was red from the wind, the weeping. "For Pete's sake," Ann said angrily, looking out at the sky, steel gray, and the high clouds streaming toward them out of the west, "all this stew over an old-maid schoolteacher."

So terribly unattractive when she sulks, Mrs. Brogden was thinking, you'd never know it was the same child; her features go all doughy. I wish she'd hurry up and outgrow it.

"What's she look like?" Ann said. "Will you even recognize her?"

"Well, she's tall," Mrs. Brogden said; and then despairingly, "Oh, I don't know; gray hair, gray flannel suits, kind of distinguished-looking, I suppose."

"Teddibly propah." That was Ann's idea of a Boston accent. "Miss Ella Oglesby."

The wind rattled at the windowpanes in a fury. Mrs. Brogden hunched deeper inside her fur coat. "Miss O. must be seventy if she's a day," she said. "It must be all of twenty-five years since I saw her last."

"You won't even recognize her," Ann told her mother flatly. She was fumbling for a handkerchief in her coat pocket.

"Here," Mrs. Brogden said, "here's a clean one." No, it's Miss O. who won't recognize me, she was thinking; how could she possibly? And her mind went skimming away again, wildly, as if the mad March wind had got right inside her: all the years in the little country town, her marriage, the children coming; the big high-ceilinged house with the trellised veranda above the river; all the years adding up. Adding up to what? she thought nervously, suddenly seeing the everyday business of housekeeping and child raising, Cub Scouts and P.T.A. meetings, bridge club, ladies' auxiliary, library board; chairman of the board—the madam-president stuff—all gone stale and humdrum and meaningless. Of course she won't know me, Mrs. Brogden thought, and then furiously, I must remember to stand up straight. She took a deep breath and squared her shoulders. "She's fussy about posture," she said aloud to Ann. "Will you please try to stand up straighter? I bet she hasn't changed a bit."

Ann blew her nose. "Decrepit," she said. "Shaky. Probably senile."

Mrs. Brogden turned away. She had agonized dutifully with her first-born, nodded compassionately over the second. Now in Ann, her youngest, the moodiness and the rebellion were purely maddening: the bickering, the posturing, the rudeness that went with them. She paced a few steps one way, a few the other. I was about Ann's age when I went East to school, she thought. I left from this very platform one September afternoon a thousand years ago. She frowned at the faded lettering on the yellow station across the tracks: BORDEAUX, ILL., the sign said, POP. 8622.

"I shall be passing through your part of the world on my way to Phoenix," Miss O. had written, all those spiky consonants and the neat rounded vowels; her handwriting resembled her speech, staccato, rapid fire. ". . . seriously considering living in Arizona permanently . . . the New England winters a hardship now." It had seemed so harmless, inviting her to stop off for the weekend. Besides, there had been some sort of nostalgia prompting; idiotic, Mrs. Brogden thought—one should never look back. It was like opening the door on an attic junk room and there it all was, under the dust and the mouse droppings. Let's not go poking into all that garbage, Mrs. Brogden told herself in Ann's language, let's just leave that be, for Pete's sake.

But the thing was she couldn't leave it be; she had to begin pulling it all apart again, recognizing this, remembering that: yellowed snapshots, mildewed programs. She wrinkled her nose at the fancied smell of dust.

"Oh, do stop pacing," Ann said. "I didn't mean to be so stinking cross, mother, but you have to admit it does louse up my plans for the weekend."

"Yes, I know, darling," Mrs. Brogden said absently. Ann had wanted the car and of course it was out of the question. Besides, Miss O. was speaking (on Emily Dickinson) to the Friday Night Book Worms tonight and they had worked out a complicated program for Saturday. "Miss O.'s never been out of New England in her life," she said, "except to New York once in a while; I know she wants to see the Lincoln country."

"I think Donald's father is an absolute creep," Ann insisted, "not letting us have his car."

"There'll be other weekends," Mrs. Brogden said. Hundreds of weekends, she thought, and dozens of Donalds and Ronalds and Eddies and Freddies. But no Vladimirs.

They watched a sheet of newspaper come flapping toward them along the tracks, take off on the wind like a gawky bird, collapse into the cindery roadbed.

At Ann's age I was . . . seventeen and the world was my oyster, Mrs. Brogden thought. "And now goodmorrow to our waking souls." . . . Oh, for heaven's sake, it wasn't like that at all. Reading Donne by

CONTINUED ON PAGE 146

"When I played in Zagreb," Vladimir said,
"in Budapest, in Rome,
in Vienna . . ."

ILLUSTRATED BY ROBERT C. HARRIS

Growing up to

PORTRAITS BY A. K. LAWRENCE

Determined to spare her son the loneliness she so well remembers from her own childhood, Queen Elizabeth broke a thousand-year-old tradition when she sent Prince Charles away to school. How has it affected Britain's heir apparent? What is the answer to the queen's most important question, "Will he be happy?"

By JAMES BROUGH

One morning last December, a long-awaited envelope arrived at Buckingham Palace. It was a plain, buff-colored foolscap envelope addressed to Queen Elizabeth and bundled among a batch of other letters. Inside it was an ordinary-looking school report—and evidence to tell her whether a dream of hers had succeeded or failed.

The dream centers on her son, Prince Charles. In an effort to give him the carefree childhood she never knew, the queen has turned her back on a thousand-year-old tradition and sent him off to boarding school to be educated as a commoner.

When she read what his masters had written about him, she had good reason to smile. He had survived his first months away from home, to her surprise, without a "black," a demerit given for bad conduct. Less surprisingly, he had not earned a single "gold," a good-behavior mark.

At sports, he was passionately keen. At his lessons, there was considerable room for improvement. Still rather shy but very sturdy, he was popular and completely accepted by the other boys. His mother was content. The really important assessment lay written between the lines: Charles was an average nine-year-old. And, above all else, he was happy.

Britain's student prince is one of ninety boys who attend Cheam preparatory school in Berkshire, about fifty miles from London. The queen and Prince Philip delivered their glum son there last September and, apart from Christmas and Easter vacations, he has been there ever since.

Charles arrived with a big, consoling box of soft-centered milk chocolates wrapped in gilt foil and stamped with an embossed "C." This was one of the few indications that he was not entirely like

At Cheam, Charles has not earned a single "gold"—good-behavior mark.
He makes his own bed, scrubs for inspection, gets ribbed about his "stingy" allowance, and enjoys playing pranks on friends.

The King

his schoolmates. But the regal candy was short-lived. When his mother and father, after a gentle kiss and a hearty handshake, had driven home, some of the other chaps wolfed the chocolates.

He was preceded to Cheam by a leather trunk with "H.R.H. Prince Charles" painted in white on its brown flank, but that is kept out of sight in a storeroom now. The queen wants her son to enjoy a few years of forgetting the awesome fact that, barring accidents, he is the predestined ruler of the British Commonwealth.

She has chosen Cheam for the experiment in teaching Charles how to be happy though royal for three sound reasons. For one thing, her husband was enrolled there as an impoverished refugee princeling from France who spoke precious little English. "Wearing the same old school tie as father" is a powerful British custom.

Then she has the promise of the two headmasters, Peter Beck and Mark Wheeler, that her son will be brought up just like any other average boy. The queen, who remembers wistful days in her own childhood spent staring through the palace windows at "ordinary people," earnestly wants her son to be "average" and therefore happy.

So he was sent to Cheam because when she asked her most important question, "Will Charles be happy there?" the answer was: "Cheam looks for the happy boy rather than the brilliant one, with the result that an extremely happy atmosphere has developed." With that settled, she outfitted her excited heir with his school uniform (gray wool jacket and shorts, Oxford-blue cap monogrammed with a Cambridge-blue "C") at Harrod's department store in Knightsbridge, London, just like all other Cheam parents. And at her suggestion, all the other parents were sent a letter by Mr. Wheeler and Mr. Beck: "It is the wish of the queen and Prince Philip that there shall be no alteration in the way the school is run and that Prince Charles shall be treated exactly the same as the other boys. The staff will call him and refer to him as Prince Charles, but the boys will call him Charles. It would be a great help if you would explain this to your boys . . ."

Cheam is a timeless institution occupying a converted red brick manor house standing in sixty-five acres of well-wooded grounds. At various locations, it has been providing an education for upper-class Britons since 1665, when its founding father, the Reverend George Aldritch, fled from London to escape the Great Plague. At Cheam, as at similar establishments scattered throughout Britain, well-to-do small boys arrive in moist-eyed misery, learn first to endure and then enjoy the unchanging code of Spartan courage, steamed puddings and no sneaking.

To the growing concern of his parents, Charles in his pre-Cheam days was a tense, worried-looking little boy. The rough-and-tumble life he leads is changing that. He already proudly regards himself as "one of the chaps." One lunchtime wrestle around a thornbush did bring tears, but even by the school's rugged code that was understandable—a thorn had stuck in his finger.

In accordance with Cheam traditions, he has gouged his initial with a penknife on his desk, a task for every "mealy eye" (which is school slang for a new boy). He has picked up the lingo that talks of chums and chaps, cads and rotters. He can hold his own in the ragging that sometimes turns his dormitory into a den of dervishes.

When he was asked whether he liked school, he answered cautiously, "Well, yes and no. I miss my pets." He was lonesome for his corgi dog, Sherry, and his Cossack pony, Zamin, which Khrushchev and Bulganin presented to him on their 1956 visit to Britain. Charles wanted Zamin at school with him, but Headmaster Beck said, "Not possible." Perhaps because to him "home" means a half dozen different palaces, castles and mansions, Charles has missed suffering the usual mealy eye's homesickness. But his mother's determination to make him indistinguishable from his schoolmates causes him another kind of trouble, as was clearly illustrated one gray afternoon last winter.

Charles and another boy ran whooping with health and high spirits out of school down to the pond below the lily pool. Clutched in the hands of the other boy was a spanking model sailboat, which the owner directed on a succession of voyages across the water, until the prince could stand it no longer. He begged to be promoted from first mate and given a turn as captain. The following dialogue was overheard:

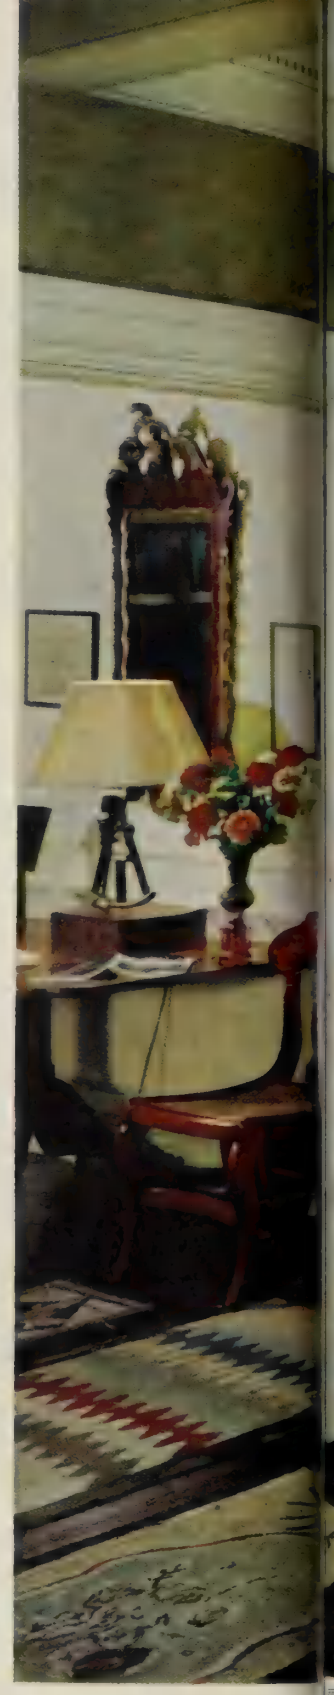
"Why don't you get your mother to buy you a boat?"... "She said I had to see what the other boys had first before she sent me any presents."

Ever since Charles went to Cheam, the queen has been waiting to see what the other boys have, watching to see what other parents do, patterning her ways on theirs. She has no personal experience to draw on because she was never allowed to go to school. Philip's knowledge of parental behavior is conditioned by the fact that he was a virtual orphan brought up by relatives. While her son learns how to be an average schoolboy, the queen is teaching herself how to behave like an average mother, English prep-school style.

She writes to him once a week without fail, and every Sunday afternoon, like it or not, he writes back. That is a compulsory chore for all Cheam boys. Presumably his first letter home after the sailboat incident told the whole sad story. A few days later he received a brand-new toy yacht, the smallest of its kind at Cheam, but that doesn't bother him.

His mother asks for no special reports and she makes no special inquiries about him. When he caught Asian flu, she had a lady in waiting make a telephone call or two to Matron Sheila Jack for the latest medical bulletin, but that was the only concern she would permit herself to show.

He had no half day off to welcome his parents back from New York CONTINUED ON PAGE 153



Albert Kingsley Lawrence is a noted portrait and figure painter and a member of the Royal Academy. His endearing portraits of children so pleased Queen Elizabeth that she commissioned him to do these pastels of Prince Charles and Princess Anne. Bruce and Beatrice Gould saw the portraits when they visited Mr. Lawrence in his studio in Holland Park Road and made arrangements to reproduce them in the JOURNAL.

Unlike her brother, Princess Anne is still being educated in the royal tradition. She has her lessons in the palace schoolroom and finds her friends in the tightly restricted court circle.

THE CAPTAIN'S HOUSE COMMANDS EDGARTOWN'S HARBOR FRONT.

The Austrian paper in the long dining room is hand-painted in panels, with New York Harbor over the fine Philadelphia sideboard and the Philadelphia waterworks over the mantelpiece. The chairs are Queen Anne, and the table is set with the owners' yachting china. The side lights were once for whale oil, and the lamp through the doorway was made from Captain Fisher's octant.

CAPTAIN'S HOUSE ON Martha's Vineyard

By RICHARD PRATT

According to tradition, this is really a whaling captain's house, the owners tell me: they being the fifth generation of the family to live in it: foursquare and three stories high. Capt. Jared Fisher was the whaling captain in this case for whom the house was built in 1832, facing the harbor at Edgartown, a yachting harbor now, and Edgartown now a summer town, parlor-neat and sparkling white like the captain's house itself.

The whaling bark Canton, of which you see a sailor's model standing on the living-room mantel, was one of the captain's commands: and you will understand why a whaling captain's house was foursquare and three stories high when you hear that during her whaling days the Canton made more than $2,000,000 for her several owners from whalebone and oil. And that was a time, remember, when $2,000,000 was really quite a handsome sum.

Attribute much of the handsomeness here in the house to the fact that a sailor's house can never be less than very beautiful, if it wants to be as beautiful as a sailor's ship usually is.

That is old Captain Fisher's gold-headed cane in the newel of the staircase, and out there through the doorway's classic-revival frame is Edgartown Harbor.

To the right of the Canton model on the mantelpiece is a portrait of Capt. John Osborn, Captain Fisher's father-in-law and great-great-great-grandfather of the present owner. Fisher's wife, Desire, started out with six bird's-eye-maple chairs like the one against the stairway.

Far right: All the pictures, quilts, rugs, samplers and upholstery in the master bedroom are either hand-sewn or embroidered. The quilt on the left is the story of Moby Dick: the one on the right shows all the family boats since the present owner, now a yachtsman of note, was a small boy.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY EZRA STOLLER. MR. AND MRS. E. JARED BLISS, JR., OWNERS

100 MEN

What do men really think of women?

"When I was in college," said the bachelor I was interviewing, "I thought I'd be married by the time I reached twenty-three. Then I started out in a job and twenty-six seemed a better age. Now I'm thirty-five and I notice that the older I get ——" He broke off with a shrug. "I don't know," he said abruptly. "I can't seem to find the right girl."

This elusive right girl, my notes on 100 interviews tell me, is the composite that spells perfection. She has the face of the most beautiful girl a man has ever seen, the body of the most alluring, the mind of the most intelligent and the disposition, certainly, of an angel. The confirmed bachelor persists in the search long after the realization has dawned that what he seeks is not of this earth; it is easier to do this than to accept the reality, the girl who is merely human.

Not all the men I interviewed come into the bachelor classification; some were as yet too young to fit the popular notion, others too clearly marriage-minded to be anything but potential husbands. Confirmed bachelor or hopeful wife seeker, however, my hundred had one interest in common: the girls. They were delighted to point out to this married listener the flaws in the pretty creatures. Experts all, they knew what the girls were doing that was wrong or ill-advised and they were glad to go on record—anonymously.

This is what they said:

"Girls forget femininity."

It was a general complaint, voiced in many terms: a preference for longer hair ("They whack it off because it looks good that way on some Hollywood doll"), for styles not borrowed from the men ("Not one woman in fifty has the figure for shorts, but they wear them"), and for gentle speech and behavior ("They try to be 'one of the boys'"). A good-looking TV executive interviewed in the broadcasting-station lunchroom asked with a frown, "Whatever happened to the feminine woman?" At thirty-four he was convinced, he said, that what he was looking for must be pretty Victorian, "and I am not going to look for her in the backwoods."

A younger man said with an air of mournfulness, "I've been a bachelor, a word I don't even like to use, for some time now. Maybe the girls I meet are more aggressive than the average; they seem to me overly independent, too self-sufficient. I wouldn't want a girl who's a baby, but the domineering type clashes with my own personality."

The view of a graduate student preparing for a career in industry was that no normal man wants a girl as competitor or buddy. "In college, especially coed colleges, the girls go all out to prove that they're worthy competitors of the men—athletes, thinkers and romancers. I want a girl who knows the meaning of femininity and is a living expression of all the qualities that exemplify it." His voice turned scornful. "Most girls think of femininity in terms of 'lace over butter,' a kind of mush. They should study what it really is: character, and gentleness, and warmth."

Consensus: Femininity speaks softly, and the male ego listens—and responds.

"Girls rush the wedding ring."

One complainant was a petty officer aboard a passenger liner. (A writer on vacation takes notes.) "Why is it," he asked, "that girls unfailingly work around to the subject of marriage after about the third date?" "Make that the second," one of his shipmates quipped, "and I'll go along with it." Another bachelor in the group shook his head sadly. "It doesn't happen to me." He was the exception, for it was a criticism leveled by at least 75 per cent of the eligibles interviewed. Younger men spoke of "girls in the panicky twenties and their conniving little ways," and men in the thirties offered this as one of the reasons they tended to date girls in their teens. If marriage is to be proposed, the men want to do the proposing.

A keen-eyed junior executive in the pharmaceutical industry told of being rushed into an engagement without realizing what was happening. "The girl wanted to get married right away and her mother was all set to make the arrangements. It gave me such a jolt that I balked. I managed to get out of it and I've been wary ever since."

Another escapee, a man of twenty-eight with the bluest eyes I ever saw and the readiest smile, told of falling in willy-nilly with the plans of his mother and sister that he date only Ida, the girl of their choice. Ida came up to his chin, he said, and had a way of making him feel half again his size. She also had a way of fumbling for her key

By PATRICIA MARTIN

. . AND THE GIRLS

nd why don't they marry them?

Here a hundred bachelors speak their minds.

the door. "Well—man proposes. Or yway, he thinks he does," said this -fiancé. A job in another state allowed m to take second thought and he tried ence as a means of convincing Ida that it d all been a mistake. She was at the train meet him, however, hurt but patient—d with mother and sister still her allies. Fortunately, she began trying to lay down e law and we quarreled. It wasn't the ost intelligent way out, but ——" He inned. He, too, had grown wary.

Some of the men who had been engaged ere hazy as to the cause of the breakup: Ve weren't really suited"; "It didn't work t"; "We both realized it was a mistake." ut one who spoke wistfully about his -fiancée said that after a while her criti-sm of what he said and did, what he wore d was, became too much for him. "My ir, for example, was getting thin." (It was still getting thin, but it was there.) "I knew it was, so when she made an appointment for me with this so-called scalp specialist I didn't object. But he had less hair than I! So I told her I wasn't going back. She didn't care, she said. It wasn't important. It made no difference." Thinking back, a look of sorely tried patience came over his face. "But I would find her looking at me. Suppose I tried parting it on the other side, she would say—would that help? I got fed up. You can take just so much." He sighed, gazing off into space. "She was a nice girl, though; she knew how things should be done."

One man expressed the belief that there is more class-consciousness in our society than we are willing to admit. It had been a factor in the breakup of his engagement. "Whenever I was with her family I tried to adjust to their way of living and thinking, but I was always acutely aware of the poverty of the environment, intellectually and otherwise. I liked this girl—I liked her very much—but whenever we were with other people, especially my own family, I was tense and nervous, thinking she might say something stupid and give herself away."

Consensus: Men become engaged more readily than they are led to the altar. They see the period of betrothal as an opportunity for taking thought.

"Girls seldom consider your job."

This was cited as the most frequent obstacle in the way of serious romantic interest. A physician on the staff of a Philadelphia hospital said that when he was in medical school and dating a girl who lived in another state, "It meant the entire weekend whenever I saw her, and I couldn't always do it; I had to study. She refused to accept this even when I told her I was hanging on intellectually with my teeth. I was in love—but I had to give her up." Another physician said that his failure to marry was due in part to the realization that his friends in the profession found marriage "a sweet tyranny." "They literally cannot get away to meetings. The wife who can accept the demands of our calling is rare indeed." That nurses are the winners in this case will come as a surprise to no one. But I had not known that policemen and firemen woo nurses for much the same reason: they know what it means to be on call and they neither fuss when a date must be broken nor object to the last-minute invitation.

"I think girls tend to plan too far in advance," said a young market analyst. "I suppose it's date insurance for them, but a fellow starting out can't always command his time." He expressed the belief, as did others, that little was accomplished by rejecting on principle the last-minute invitation. "The girl should at least consider the circumstances. Often nowadays nothing else is possible for the man."

A photographer in industry told me that he had been

CONTINUED ON PAGE 144

SO THEY SAY!

"Maybe I'll marry—if I can find a girl who is without guile yet not a fool."

"I have a friend who's been married a year. I've heard him say, 'I never knew what happiness was until I got married and looked back.'"

"Girls in their twenties get panicky and conniving. So the younger they are, the more they appeal the older you get."

"You can't come right out and ask why she doesn't invite you to dinner once in a while, but if she expects you to go for broke date after date and makes no return beyond the pleasure of her company, you begin to lose interest."

"Smoking, drinking—a girl can do almost anything, as long as she does it gracefully."

"I want a family and I look at the girl as a prospective mother. You can't breed a trotting horse from a mule; you've got to be choosy."

"The girl who married dear old dad is still the best model for the rest. After all, she's the first woman you know and she's awfully nice to you. Even if you can't tell a girl she reminds you of your mother, chances are she will, a little, if she's your kind of girl."

"I'm in no hurry. I'm waiting for a woman who can take care of me as well as I can take care of myself."

"I don't care whether she can cook or not—I think a career girl brings more to a marriage."

"Girls judge you by somebody else they have met. They don't try to find out what you are really like."

"Girls shouldn't sweet-talk a man when they are using him as a good-time Charlie. They should be sincere."

"A girl should learn to make her own decisions. Let the parents discuss things with her without thinking for her. That's her job."

"I cannot get enough of endearing terms."

"Girls frighten me to death. When I'm introduced I get tongue-tied. Why does the fellow have to do all the footwork?"

"I wouldn't marry a woman under forty—that's near my own age—and unless I find an intelligent one I'll remain single."

"I'm skeptical of girls who are unusually beautiful. They tend to be spoiled."

"Grooming before looks. That's the most important."

"That compact at the table! Is a girl with you when she's looking at herself in a mirror?"

"I should have married young. As I grow older I become more particular and less desirable."

MARY MORRIS STEINER

ICE PALACE

BY EDNA FERBER

CONCLUSION

Bridie and Thor sat together in one of the sagging seats of the old DC-3, churning its way to Barrow on the shores of the Arctic. Christine was not, for the moment, an occupant of the cabin. She was not only occupying the cockpit with Ross Guildenstern; she was competently at the controls.

Bridie's customary sartorial perfection was slightly marred by the temporary victory of the flesh over the spirit. An airline red wool blanket covered her knees and ankles, another was wrapped snugly around her modish sealskin shoulders, and over her draped blue silk turban she had tied a wool scarf that was knotted under her chin. In spite of obvious difficulties, she had managed to work one hand loose and she now was polishing off her second roast-beef sandwich.

"You going to let her see this boy like this, all the time?"

"She's eighteen, Bridie."

"I wish you could of seen her face when he said, 'This is my son Rolf.' She just stood there like a statue. But I'll say this for her, good stock will tell. One of those queens you claim you're related to couldn't have come to quicker or more dignified. 'How wonderful,' she says. 'How can you bear to leave him up here when you get back to Oogruk so seldom?' You'd think she was a visiting nurse talking, or something. He says Angeline and Frank—that's his aunt and uncle the boy lives with—are crazy about him. The boy needs family affection, his age, and he says when he's ten he's going to bring the boy to Baranof and put him in school there and live with him, so he'll have a real home of his own. Well, just figure that one out, would you kindly?"

"That sounds very intelligent. That's what we tried to do with Chris. We were lucky to have you to help us."

"Thor Storm, don't you care what happens to Chris?"

"More than anything in the world."

"My beautiful wonderful Chris! Father of a boy six years old—and never even mentioned him before."

"Bridie, dear girl, Chris isn't marrying anyone just yet. She's going to Seattle for two years and she's looking forward to it. You know that. After this Barrow trip I'd say that she has seen her own Alaska from tip to tip. Very few girls of her age can say that. Or girls three times her age."

"That's fine. Maybe she's enjoyed all this dog-sledding and airplaning. But what's a young girl want to see Barrow for? A God-forsaken wilderness sitting on the Arctic Ocean. Why, men and women who've lived in Alaska sixty, seventy years never saw Barrow and never wanted to."

"A strange thing is going on in that Eskimo village. It has jumped in half a dozen years from an Arctic wilderness to a laboratory. It's a workshop full of scientists and engineers and Air Force men. Do you know there are Eskimos up there so naturally trained to sound and mechanisms that they can tell whether an unseen plane, miles up in the sky, is an American or a foreign plane? Don't you think that's uncanny?"

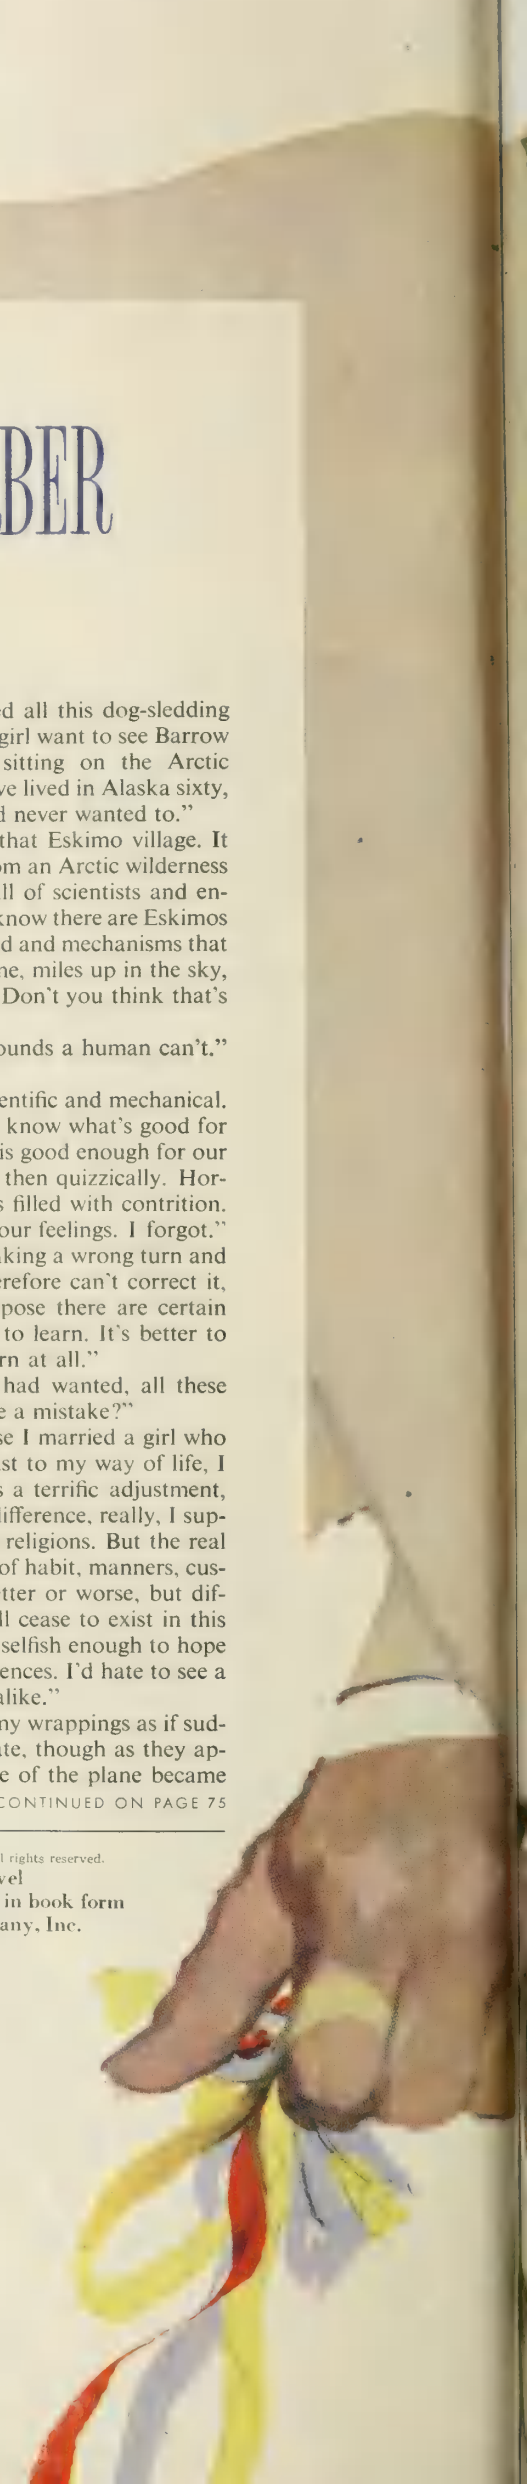
"I've been told a dog can hear sounds a human can't."

"Bridie."

"I don't know anything about scientific and mechanical. I only know she isn't old enough to know what's good for her. Do you think that Eskimo boy is good enough for our Chris? Do you?" He looked at her then quizzically. Horrified at what she had said, she was filled with contrition. "Oh, Thor, I didn't mean to hurt your feelings. I forgot."

Quietly he said, "If I see Chris making a wrong turn and she doesn't see the mistake and therefore can't correct it, I speak to her about it. But I suppose there are certain mistakes one has to make in order to learn. It's better to learn by mistakes than never to learn at all."

She could not stop herself. She had wanted, all these years, to know. "Was your marriage a mistake?"



"Yes. In its own way. Not because I married a girl who was part Eskimo. She couldn't adjust to my way of life, I couldn't adjust to hers. Marriage is a terrific adjustment, at best. It isn't a matter of exterior difference, really, I suppose. Different color, yes. Different religions. But the real difference lies in thousands of years of habit, manners, customs, standards. Not necessarily better or worse, but different. Perhaps those differences will cease to exist in this world of easy communication. I am selfish enough to hope not—in my lifetime. I love the differences. I'd hate to see a world in which the people were all alike."

Bridie began to unwind her mummy wrappings as if suddenly emerging into a warmer climate, though as they approached the Arctic the temperature of the plane became colder by the minute. "I'll

CONTINUED ON PAGE 75

Copyright © 1958 by Edna Ferber. All rights reserved.

The complete novel has recently been published in book form by Doubleday & Company, Inc.

"Ross, I don't know what I'm going to do," said Chris.
"I feel so mixed up."

HAVE

Incomparably fresh rose-color piqué, a bare slip of a dress under a jacket. Andrew Arkin.

Blue clover cotton pretty summer dance or party dress. By Alix of Miami.

White pumps and jewelry.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WILHELA CUSHMAN

Bathing suit with a transparent jacket—the same print in two fabrics. Alix of Miami.

Low-belted and bloused silhouette in blue-and-violetplaid Dacron and cotton. Add this for fashion and color.

Patio pajamas of hyacinth-blue cotton with gold design, a fashion for the young and slender. Beautiful for late afternoons or summer evenings at home. By Dorothy McNab.

A BEAUTIFUL SUMMER

Two weeks of vacation . . .
lovely long weekends . . .
cool and pretty hot-weather clothes.

PLAN AROUND MAUVE AND BLUE and cyclamen . . .

town suit to play clothes . . .

summer is the time for color.

By WILHELA CUSHMAN Fashion Editor

Coin dots—dollar-size

Striking and pretty. A dress with a shoulder-tip white collar and short full skirt that manages a crisp look on the hottest day. The fabric is spun rayon with all its good-for-summer qualities. By Anne Klein.

HAVE A BEAUTIFUL SUMMER

A bouquet print

in silk shantung with a tangerine background. Softly belted with the new floating-back silhouette, for summer afternoons and evenings. By Lilly Dache.

Rain-shedding cotton coat in a gray-and-white stripe. Red burlap-straw bag by Arnold Garay.

A dress with pleats

Two-piece silk shantung by Stella Sloat. Coin-dot straw bag by Josef.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WILHELA CUSHMAN

Pink checks, cool and capable way to start a weekend. A slim dress with a short jacket by Jerry Greenwald. Wear with a headband: pink bag by Morris Moskowitz.

A RAINBOW OF SUMMER COLORS . . .

each one a pretty addition to any vacation wardrobe.

Dancing plaid

Below—green and blue block cotton by Robert Crystal, worn with a candy-pink hand-knitted sweater. Turquoise leather flat sandals by Jean Bandler.

Awning-plaid

cotton—a long tailored overshirt with short piqué shorts by Dorothy Cox. Beach bag by Roger Van S.

Double-breasted chemise

Pretty wearable version of the most important fashion of the season. Slate-blue linen for town or weekends.
By Greg Draddy.

Batiste in yellow-gold

Dacron print, a full-skirted dance dress. By Jerry Gilden.
Coral kid sandals by Perugia.

PHOTOGRAPH BY HAL REIFF

Voile shirtwaist dress with orange-ice dots.

Cool Dacron-and-cotton all-summer dress that is sheer delight. By Jerry Greenwald.
Pumps by Jean Bandler.

The fashions on all these pages are presented to you because they show you the trends of the season and serve as a guide as you shop. You will find many of them in stores throughout the nation. However, if you do not find identical styles in your local shops, we believe similar ones will be available.

Bright pink and red roses printed on cotton satin make a pretty, cool summer dress. The child's dress in pink cotton satin has a large rose pocket made from a leftover scrap of her mother's dress. Both are sashed in green velvet ribbon. Mother's dress, Vogue Design No. 9517. Child's dress, No. 2831.

LOOK-ALIKE FASHIONS... FOR SUMMER

These gay young fashions have been inspired by pretty summer prints and amusing interchangeable ideas. Think how practical a child's dress with two different aprons can be. Especially when the aprons can be worn separately as sun dresses. Bright cotton florals make enchanting mother-and-daughter combinations. And for those who are slim and can wear a narrow straight silhouette, our sailor dresses in sky blue with jaunty red ties would be a happy choice. For a little boy, what could be gayer than a pair of tartan shorts? And smocked dotted swiss is a perennial favorite for little girls. ▪ By NORA O'LEARY
Pattern Editor

ROGER PRIGE

An amusing apron with matching panties and hat. Vogue Design No. 2834.

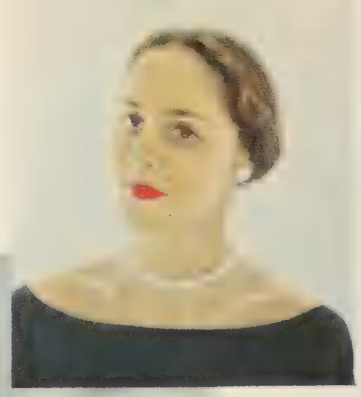
A simple lavender cotton satin dress goes under the same printed apron. Dress, Vogue Design No. 2833.

The same lavender cotton dress—this time topped with crisp white piqué with appliqué.

This brother-and-sister fashion is gay and appealing. The boy's shorts are topped with a white plaid-trimmed shirt. The little girl's dress has a white piqué button-back bolero. Boy's outfit, Vogue Design No. 2835. Girl's dress, No. 2832.

We have accented a bright garden print with a border of blue organdy. These cool dresses are bound with blue, sashed in ribbon. Mother's dress, Vogue Design No. 9517. Child's dress, No. 2831.

Cool crisp dotted swiss is such a young fashion. The mother's dress in red with a white dot has a full skirt to which we have added two rows of heavy lace. The child's dress is smocked front and back and also has a sleeveless version. Mother's dress, Vogue Design No. 9205. Child's dress, No. 2829.

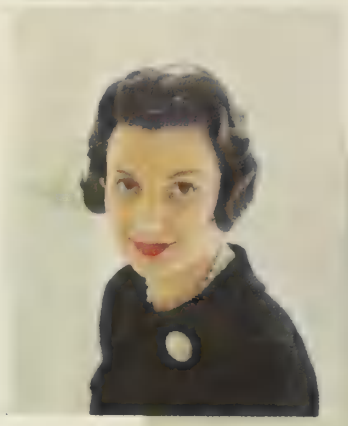


These slim, easy-fitting sailor dresses are made of sky-blue cotton twill. Their white collars have red braid and stars and the ties are bright red. Both have back pleats and a tab detail. Mother's dress, Vogue Design No. 9453. Child's, No. 2824.

JEWELRY BY POHS AND HERBERT; SHOES BY BEN SOMMERS PIQUÉ HAT BY MORRIS SANDLER

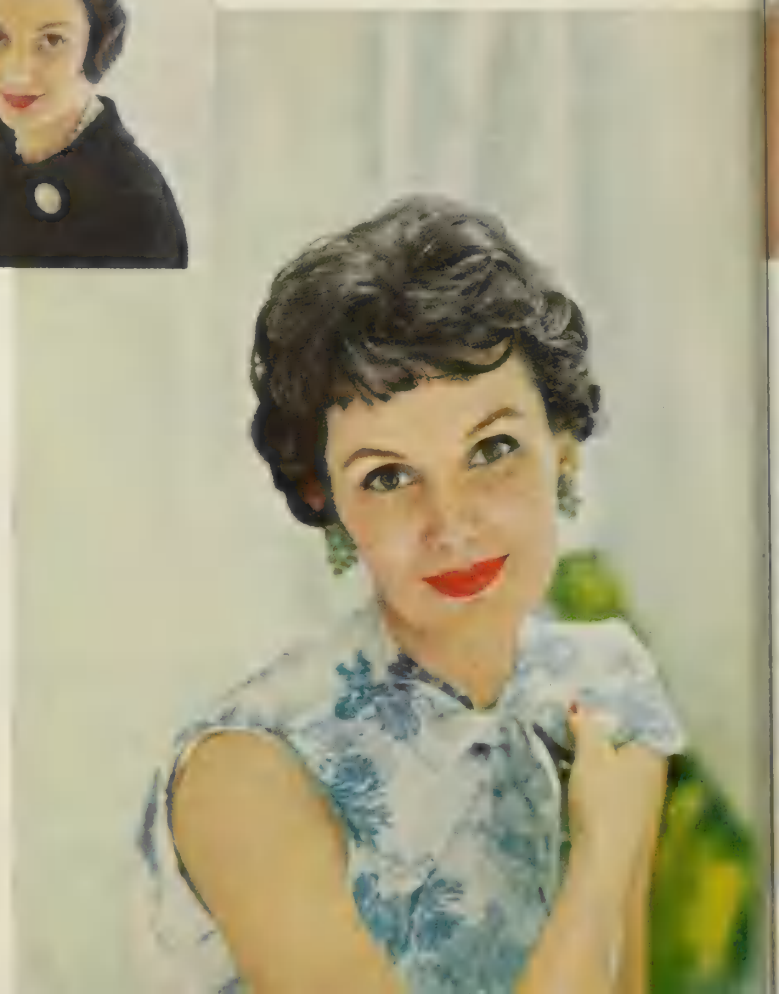
Other Views, Sizes and Prices of Vogue Patterns on Page 84. Buy Vogue Patterns at the store which sells them in your city. Or order by mail, enclosing check or money order,* from Vogue Pattern Service, Putnam Ave., Greenwich, Conn.; or in Canada from 198 Spadina Ave., Toronto, Ont. Some prices slightly higher in Canada. (*Conn. residents please add sales tax.) These patterns will be sent third-class mail. If you desire shipment first-class mail, please include 5c additional for each pattern ordered.

© VOGUE



Beauty Workshop

Lessons in



So many of you say to us in your letters, "I'd love to be able t wear more make-up, but I never know what to use or how to put it on so I settle for a safe lipstick-and-powder routine. Yet I know could look much prettier than I do." The career girls an mothers you see on these pages not only share your conviction tha artful make-up can work beauty magic, but are here to prove the point They were photographed (before) as they have been accustomed t looking each day and (after) as their appearances blosson with prettier make-up, deftly applied, and more becoming hairdos All five are delighted that their new radiance is subtle enough for daytime as well as glamorous for evening. One mother spoke for all of them whe she exclaimed, "I look so much prettier, and feel so much younger!" Busy with jobs or housework and children, these five will no always have the time or the need for making up completely each day But, as Carol Phelps says, "Believe me, it's wonderful to know how to make yourself glamorous when the occasion or the spirit moves you. My old make-up took five minutes to put on—the new make-up takes fifteen. I've never before been rewarded so handsomely for ten minutes' worth of my time!"

By DAWN CROWELL NORMAN Beauty Editor

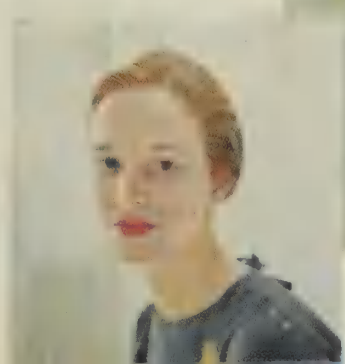
FRANCES PELLEGRINI

"That girl could be a real beauty," people have remarked about Carol Phelps, but Carol admits, "Twice last week I was accused of looking like a 'schoolmarm.'" The trouble? Her understated make-up and clothes colors and overly severe hairdo did nothing to enhance her basically pretty features. As you can see in her "before" picture, powder alone does not camouflage the dark areas under her eyes which come naturally to Carol. Her hairdo is neat but mousy. See how she glows in her "after" picture now that she uses: a creamy foundation make-up, purposely pink-toned, to help camouflage the circles and add warmth of color to her skin; blue mascara (black is hard on deep-set eyes) to emphasize the length and thickness of her lashes; a brown eyebrow pencil to smooth out her eyebrow line and create a flattering arch in the center. ("People tell me I look so wide awake—I think it's the lift in the eyebrows!") To correct her slightly uneven upper-lip line (one side is fuller than the other), Carol has learned to apply her coral-red lipstick with a brush. Finishing touches: a dusting of pinky-beige powder; a younger, more flattering hairdo cut short enough to wear in this softly waved pageboy, but left long enough for Carol to wear back in a chignon, if the mood strikes her. For the new highlights in her hair: a special rinse (it washes out) to follow her shampoo. The vibrant sunshine colors of her dress, as opposed to somber black, which is hard on most women's skin, give an over-all glow to Carol's pretty new look.

Pretty eye make-up, a new hairdo, flattering color near her face. These are the simple changes that make the exciting difference in Mrs. Joseph Rastatter's appearance. Shirley, mother of two young children, is blessed with near-flawless pink-and-white skin, rich brunet hair. Even so, her appearance lacked spark. The big beautifiers: black mascara brushed generously on her upper eyelashes; mist-green eye shadow smoothed softly across the upper eyelids, ending in an uptilt at the outer corners. (We applied Shirley's eye shadow with a clean lipstick brush. It's easier than using finger tips, which are apt to smudge the color.) Brown eyebrow pencil follows the natural line of her brow and, since Shirley's eyebrows stop abruptly at the outer corners, the pencil was continued slightly beyond the natural eyebrow line. The short hairdo with its fluff of bangs cuts the length of Shirley's face, makes her look younger, gayer. Add jade-green earrings, a feminine neckline and you have, according to Shirley, "A new woman! When my husband saw me he was so enchanted he dropped everything, called a baby sitter, bought me a flower and took me out on a date!"

Make-Up

A sandy brownette with freckles and a boyish hairdo, Gabriele Wunderlich proves that even the most tailored, outdoor type can turn enchantingly feminine if she puts her mind—and her make-up—to it. Here are the highlights: a liquid foundation make-up in a color just slightly deeper than Gabriele's own skin tones to blend and soften her freckles; a touch of cream rouge, softly blended, and a rosy-beige powder to make her skin glow; rich brown mascara to show off long, thick, sandy eyelashes. To "widen" her eyes: a soft eyebrow pencil (carefully sharpened) is used to draw a fine line along her upper eyelids as close as possible to her eyelashes. The line starts at the inner corners, ends in a little upsweep at the outer corners. The new hairdo is cut, curled and lifted for a lighthearted, definitely feminine look. Pale blue is Gabriele's best color. In her "after" picture she makes a real point of it by adding blue sparkle at her ears and neckline.



See that your make-up gives you a lift! The changes in pretty Mrs. Bromwell Ault's appearance have more to do with the way her make-up is applied than how much make-up she is wearing. In her "before" picture, Faith has on foundation make-up, powder, lipstick, eyebrow pencil. The only additions, in the "after" picture, are mascara and a touch of green eye shadow to brighten her eyes. The over-all improvement results from a series of make-up "lifts." See how much prettier the arched and upswept eyebrow line looks than the downward curve shown in Faith's first picture. Note the lift in her hairdo—from a severe, flat-top pageboy to a softly feminine wide-waved pageboy brushed up at the forehead. Blond "streaks" in her hair, near the front, provide pretty added highlights. In her "after" picture, Faith gets the lift that comes from wearing a singularly becoming color. The flower-sprigged white gives her skin a glow, while the beige seems flat and uninteresting. A lift in expression helps too. Compare Faith's serious look with that fetching smile!

Even a heavenly shade of hair cannot make up for a drained-of-color look that seems inevitable when pale skin, pale eyelashes and brows are left unadorned. Here, redheaded Mrs. Gaston de Havenon makes her washed-out-to-wonderful changes by using: a creamy foundation make-up in pale beige spread lightly and evenly over her face and neck; to heighten her color, cream rouge, gently blended. Deep brown mascara, a hint of blue eye shadow, and a reddish-brown eyebrow pencil to draw a pretty curve for her eyebrows give beautiful new emphasis to the entire eye area. A blue-red lipstick does much more than the pink to dramatize Anna Lou's fragile skin coloring. Her upswept hairdo turns from plain to pretty when bangs are cut and allowed to sweep across her high forehead. Turquoise and delicate pink are accessory and clothes colors a redhead can wear to perfection!

Can this Marriage be Saved?

One of the functions of a counselor, it has often been said, is "to hold a mirror up before the client." The latter is not told, "You are thus and so." His ideas, his attitudes, his feelings are merely reflected back to him by the counselor so that he faces them and recognizes them as he never did before; and it is he who then tells himself, "I am thus and so—I don't like it and I will change." This process of helping the client see himself as he really is must not be thought to be the major part of marriage counseling; but it was important in the case here described, with which we dealt at the American Institute of Family Relations in Los Angeles. Each of the partners gained insight which enabled them to straighten out the marriage. . . . In this particular instance two different counselors took part: Dr. Eva S. Olman and Pierce Ommanney.

PAUL POPENOE, Sc.D., General Director

DON ORNITZ

"One evening my father-in-law unloaded a truckful of young trees in our back yard. Sari figured they should be planted, even though she knew I was dead tired."

SHE: "How I envy girls lucky enough to marry dynamic, all-business husbands who come home and talk about their work instead of the way John likes to do—talking of love and kisses. Our quarrels revolve around the same old theme: his lack of ambition and drive. Bone-laziness and pigheaded stubbornness are holding John back."

HE: "The night Sari and I separated was the lowest period of my life, but the tensions in our home were getting to our kids. They were screaming at one another the way Sari screamed at me—to work harder, make more money, buy a bigger house."

SARI TELLS HER SIDE: "John and I have been separated for six months," said thirtyish Sari, the pretty and vivacious but firm-jawed mother of three. "John comes to the house every Saturday to visit the children—our daughter, Betty, is twelve, our twin sons are seven—but I have consulted a lawyer about filing suit for divorce. How I am to pay his fees I don't quite know unless I can borrow the money from my father.

"John is in worse financial shape than usual. Six weeks before our separation he lost his construction business, a small operation but his own, and began working part time for somebody else. If John had applied himself, if he had only cared enough for me and the children, I'm sure he could have made a success of his own company.

"Other men in our circle, with much less on the ball, are rising in the world. John's brother, Ted, ten years his junior, is a full-fledged surgeon. My kid sister's husband is a partner in a prominent law firm; my two girl cousins married prosperous businessmen. It seems to me that everybody is getting ahead except John. Bone-laziness and pigheaded stubbornness are holding him back. He has repeatedly refused to go into business with my father.

"Father, a big-time contractor, is coining money; he has just bought a brand-new ten-room house for mother, their third new home in two years. The best John can provide for us after fourteen years of marriage is an old-fashioned two-family house, without modern conveniences, plunked down in a second-rate neighborhood. The only thing good about our place is the back-yard garden, and father paid for the plants, the brick walks, high brick wall and the patio.

"I must say John is giving more to me and the children, small as his weekly check is, than he is spending on his own living arrangements. On the night he packed his clothes and left us—this happened in June at the time of his brother's marriage—he moved into a cheap, run-down motel. Frankly, I was surprised John didn't return to his parents. He's made it plain he prefers their company to mine. Whenever he and I disagreed or if I suggested he put in a few more hours on his job or expend a little energy on household chores, he immediately looked to his mother and father for comfort. They consider him and his brother Ted—my in-laws have only the two children—just about perfect.

"In a way, I guess Ted's wedding touched off the big fight between John and me. For days I heard about the preparations for the huge reception, the decorations at the church, the bride's color scheme, the bride's real-lace veil, her custom-made shoes and gloves. Nobody seemed to think it strange or unfair that the oldest son's wife—namely, me—couldn't afford a new dress for the occasion.

"By the time the great day rolled around I was sick at heart. But I couldn't disappoint John and the children (our Betty was junior bridesmaid) so I appeared at the church. However, I skipped the reception and about four hours later that evening John and I split up.

"It's pointless to describe the battle in detail. It was like all our other fights. I screamed and yelled; John got pinched and white but didn't say a word to defend himself. His silence has always been far more maddening to me than words. He and I have been at odds for years—our fights began even before Betty was born—and our quarrels have invariably revolved around the same old theme: John's lack of ambition and drive.

"How I envy the girls who are lucky enough to marry dynamic, driving, all-business husbands! Husbands who come home and talk about their work instead of coming in the way John likes to do—talking love and kisses, or asking, 'Why don't we

CONTINUED ON PAGE 149

Foolproof Color Schemes #3

By CYNTHIA McADOO WHEATLAND
Interior Decoration Editor

SHE: I can hardly wait to get started on decorating our new apartment.

HE: Now don't go wild; remember, I'm not a millionaire.

But with a minimum of cost it is quite possible to create a world of charm, and the magic wand is a gay and pleasing use of color.

This month our foolproof color scheme is based on green, red and white. Green doors and bookcases (fireplace, too, if you are lucky enough to have one) brighten up the white walls yet keep the feeling light and gay in a room that is not overly sunny. Full-length curtains of green denim add an air of luxury to the room. If you feel that you are not much good with a needle, ready-made curtains in many colors which fit any standard-size window can be bought for little.

HAROLD FOWLER

TRADITIONAL: Striped elegance of the sofa blends well with white walls, green bookcases and curtains.

A broad red-and-white stripe—here in chintz, but could be sailcloth, duck or a striped denim—can be used to cover square, skirted ottomans. A table you have, or one picked up cheaply, takes on a new lease of life and elegance painted in shiny black or white enamel. Chairs painted red to match the stripes on the ottomans and sofa pillows can be fitted with seat cushions covered in wipe-clean white plastic or the same sturdy green denim used to cover the sofa. On the spatter-sprayed floor (there's a new paint on the market which has the spatters magically trapped in one jar) a white washable rug—cotton or nylon (also available are square feet of cotton carpet, padded and adhesive backed, which can be added to as money allows)—keeps the light, bright and practical outlook of the whole room intact.

These colors can be mixed and matched different ways. If you have a light room with large windows, reverse the process—green walls, white bookcase and door or curtains. Your taste and preference are your guide in using these lovely colors, but whichever way you choose to use it a red, white and green color scheme, you'll find, adapts easily and prettily to almost any type of room and style of furniture.

MODERN: Large areas of white used with green walls give a fresh backgroun

Cook, Freeze and

Roast Duckling Piquant

Tender-crisp quarters of duckling in an elusively flavored sauce— a real masterpiece.

Glazed Ham Loaf

Box office at any buffet and a family favorite, this versatile ham loaf with its sweet-sour glaze may be served hot or cold.

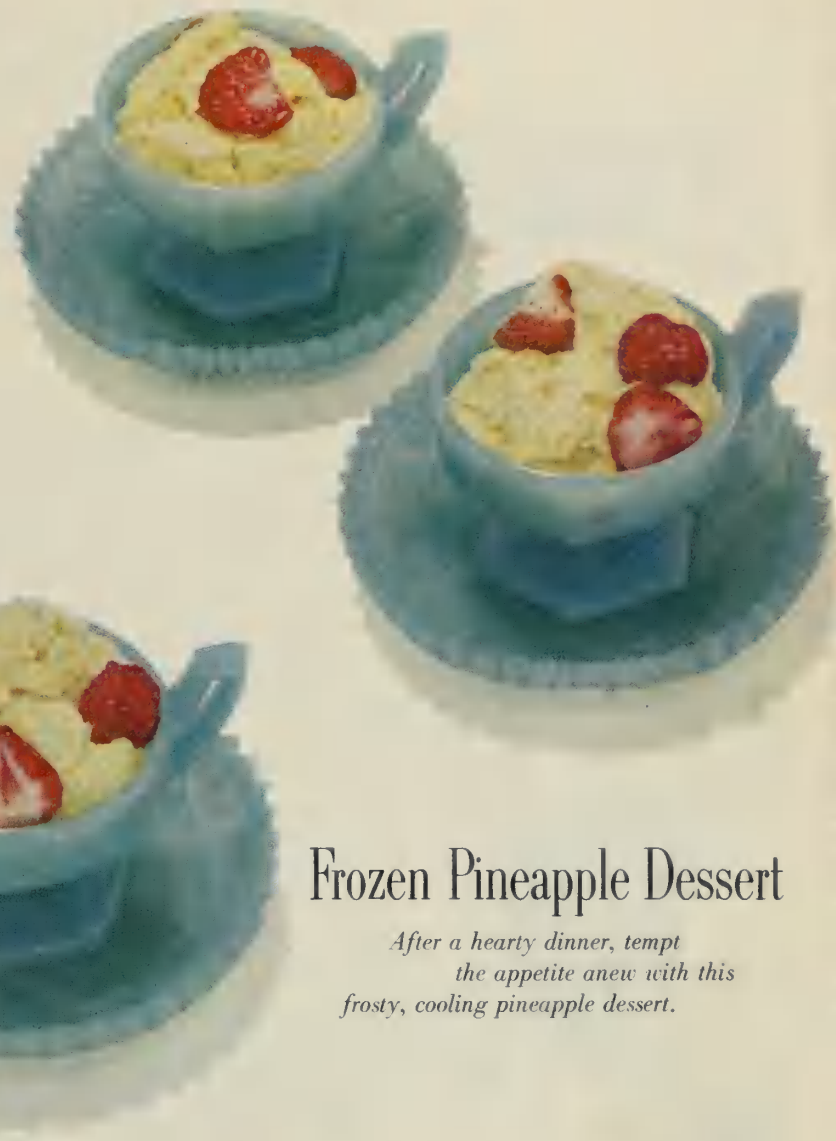
Once in a blue moon you come upon a recipe that sends you scurrying about for pencil and paper, thinking, "How perfect for our next party!" It sounds so delicious, so enticing, and such fun to cook that you can't wait to try it out on your friends. That very minute you start planning a guest list, visualizing the table spread with tempting party fare, the house fragrant with flowers, yourself in your prettiest dress. Best of all, you discover, you won't have to spend the day of the party in the kitchen. On the festive evening, fresh and rested, you will simply draw from the freezer the delectable main course of your dinner—cooked and frozen days before!

Our three favorite dishes for party dining combine excellence of freezing qualities with elegance of taste—each one has an intriguing "difference" that stimulates the imagination as well as the appetite. The sweet-sour glazed ham loaf, served hot or cold with a tantalizing mustard sauce, is a record breaker for buffet dinners. The crisp, succulent duckling is roasted and basted in a savory sauce, distinctively flavored with a vegetable bouquet and a subtle hint of anchovy. And the meat ball curry, accompanied by steaming-hot currant rice and condiments of chutney, toasted coconut and chopped egg-and-bacon, adds a festive note to the table and makes conversation sparkle. Any or all of these main-course masterpieces may be prepared well in advance and stored in your freezer bank until you're in the mood to entertain. Serve with one of our

Meat Ball Curry

A spicy dish with party appeal—meat ball curry served with plenty of currant rice and colorful condiments: chutney, toasted coconut, chopped egg-and-bacon.

Treasure



Your three most important parties may be prepared days ahead— leaving you free to enjoy the fun!

mix-and-match desserts, just as pretty as they are tempting—rich chocolate mousse roll, frosty-cool pineapple dessert, gossamer-light orange cream. Then settle back and enjoy your culinary triumph!

GLAZED HAM LOAF

Two loaves are better than one if you are freezer minded—or if you expect a large crowd or a hungry one. Ask your butcher to grind 2 pounds lean smoked ham and 2 pounds lean fresh pork. Mix with 1½ cups fresh rolled cracker crumbs; don't use cracker meal for this—it's too fine. Then add ⅓ cup chopped onion, 4 well-beaten eggs, 1¼ teaspoons salt, 2 cups milk and 2 tablespoons chopped parsley. Work all together until well blended. Shape into two loaves in 9″x 5″x 3″ bread pans and bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 30 minutes. While the loaves are baking, you can make the glaze. Combine ½ pound brown sugar, ½ cup cider vinegar and 1½ tablespoons dry mustard. Mix and boil 1 minute. Remove the ham loaves from oven, baste with this sauce, then set pans on a metal tray to catch any drippings and bake 1 hour longer. If there is any sauce left, baste again after the loaves have baked 30 minutes. Remove from pans while still warm. Cool, wrap and freeze.

On the day of the party, remove ham loaf or loaves from freezer 1½ hours before serving if you plan to have them cold—longer if you wish to reheat them. Heat for about 20 minutes in a moderately slow oven, 325° F. Serve with a zippy sauce made with ½ cup mayonnaise, ½ cup sour cream, ¼ cup prepared mustard, 1 tablespoon minced chives, 2 tablespoons prepared horse-radish, salt and lemon juice CONTINUED ON PAGE 136

Frozen Pineapple Dessert

After a hearty dinner, tempt the appetite anew with this frosty, cooling pineapple dessert.

Orange Rice Ring

Sprinkled with toasted almonds and garnished with orange sections, this golden treat lends festivity to any dinner.

STUART

Chocolate Mousse Roll

A light, moist cake rich with chocolate and filled with delicate creamy chocolate mousse.

Low-Calorie COLLECTOR'S ITEMS from the Journal Kitchen

A dieter's delight: sparkling and ruby-red borsch jellied into a luscious and low-calorie parfait.

Going on a low-calorie diet? Then don't just dream of three hearty meals a day with dessert. Enjoy them. Take a tip from the women who do it: actresses, singers and models whose professional success depends upon their personal good looks. Keeping slim, trim and well fed is their business. Here are their secrets.

If you find calories getting into the "best-tasting" foods as singer BETTY JOHNSON does, simply take some of them out. Betty, a home-economics major, has successfully subtracted 750 calories from beef Stroganoff. "It's our favorite company dish," says Betty. "If I take an average portion, I keep the calories down for myself" (about 235 and low for an entrée). "Guests, of course, can—and do—eat more because it seems so creamy and rich."

"CREAMY" BEEF STROGANOFF: Brown together in 2 tablespoons butter in a large skillet 1½ pounds lean top sirloin cut into thin strips about 2" long, ½ pound fresh mushrooms, sliced, and 1 large onion, peeled and sliced. Season with 1 teaspoon each salt and paprika, ¼ teaspoon pepper and a pinch of nutmeg. Cover and simmer for about 45 minutes, or until meat is tender. Drain meat drippings into a saucepan. Skim off excess fat. Make a paste using 1 tablespoon flour and ¼ cup water. When well blended, stir into the drippings. Heat, stirring constantly, until thickened. Just before serving, blend in 1 cup yoghurt. Pour over meat and serve immediately. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

REGINA RESNIK, mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, says her big diet problem is not imposing her low-calorie fare upon the whole family. Five-year-old Michael wants to eat everything she does. "I take lean meat and skim milk, he and his father the regular. So far Michael hasn't caught on." Miss Resnik experiments creatively with low-calorie foods. Two favorites are elegantly deceiving parfaits. One is an appetizer (or salad): borsch; the other, a fluffy pastel Nesselrode dessert.

BORSCH PARFAIT: Soften 2 envelopes unflavored gelatin in ¼ cup cool water, then dissolve in 1 quart hot canned borsch. Cool slightly and add the juice of ½ lemon, 1 tablespoon each onion juice and finely chopped onion, 1 teaspoon chopped dill and 2 dashes hot red-pepper sauce and a few drops red food coloring. Pour into 2 refrigerator trays and chill until firm. For the dressing: Thin ½ cup sour cream with 1 tablespoon lemon juice and 1 teaspoon white wine vinegar. Season with ¼ teaspoon garlic salt, ⅛ teaspoon seasoned salt and 2 dashes hot red-pepper sauce. Cut the jellied borsch into ½" cubes and arrange in parfait glasses with alternate teaspoonfuls sour-cream dressing. Top with a little dressing and garnish with chopped fresh dill. Makes 6 servings (each about 100 calories).

NESSELRODE PARFAIT: Separately dissolve 2 envelopes each low-calorie strawberry- and lime-flavored gelatin, following package directions. Add 3 teaspoons liquid noncaloric sweetener to each; chill until syrupy. Finely dice enough red and green maraschino cherries to make ½ cup. Drain 1 can each No. 301 dietetic peaches and water-pack tart red cherries (save juice). Dice fruit. Whip 1½ cups nonfat dry-milk solids, following package instructions but using "saved" fruit juice instead of water. Separately beat strawberry and lime gelatins until fluffy. Fold half of chopped peaches, tart red cherries and maraschino cherries into each. Then fold ⅓ of whipped milk, 1 teaspoon each vanilla and rum extract into each. Build up alternate layers of lime, strawberry and whipped "cream" in parfait glasses. Chill and serve. Makes 10 to 12 servings (120 calories each).

Model MINOR COWDEN, who must be fashionably "gaunt," likes fish. "And it's a good thing," she says, "because most fish is low-calorie." Minor makes a mysteriously mellow sauce of low-calorie mayonnaise, tomato paste, chopped onion, green pepper and herbs. "It's the sort of dish I'm proud to serve friends," she says. "I used to take cottage cheese while everyone else ate. This low-calorie fish dish makes us all happy."

FILLET OF SOLE WITH TOMATO-HERB DRESSING: Rub a warm skillet lightly with butter. Then slowly sauté 3 tablespoons finely minced onion and 2 tablespoons finely chopped green pepper until tender. Stir in the juice of 1 lime, 2 tablespoons tomato paste, 1 cup low-calorie mayonnaise, and—if you like—a few capers. Season with ½ teaspoon orégano and a pinch of savory. Place 4 fresh sole fillets on a broiler pan, sprinkle with lime juice, salt and cracked pepper and broil until just heated through (about 5 minutes). Serve topped with some of the sauce and the remainder in a separate bowl. Makes 4 servings (about 120 calories each).

"I've tried every diet in the book," says PEGGY LEE. "Once I went on a measured diet—you know, half a cup of this, a four-inch piece of bread. I literally went around with a ruler. Now I carry a list of high-calorie foods. If I'm tempted, I haul out the list—and all my will power. Whenever I make up my mind to diet, I do it. Cutting down on salt makes me lose weight. A chicken rubbed with lemon, then broiled with celery strips over it, I've found, is wonderfully juicy and doesn't really need salt."

CELERY-BROILED CHICKEN: Rub 2 young broilers, split lengthwise, all over with lemon juice. Then sprinkle with cracked pepper. Place skin side down on a broiler pan, lay strips of celery in the cavities and broil for 10–12 minutes. Turn skin side up, lay fresh celery strips over all and broil until browned and tender. Makes 4 servings (about 120 calories each).

DIANA LYNN, who expects her first baby next month, says, "Being pregnant makes you more conscious of what you eat—and should eat. And much more calorie-conscious." She loses weight by eating more often (five meals a day)—only less at each. "Fortunately I like liver. It's nutritious and low in calories." With it Diana usually tosses together her favorite salad, a crisp-tender, herb-scented spinach-and-water-cress combination.

HERB-AND-SPINACH SALAD: Wash and break up enough tender young spinach to make 2 cups (about ½ pound). Add 1 cup crisp water-cress leaves, 2 tablespoons each chopped fresh chervil and tarragon, 1 tablespoon chopped fresh dill, ¼ cup cooked, crumbled lean bacon. Salt and pepper greens to taste. For the dressing: Combine 3 tablespoons lemon juice, 2 tablespoons warm bacon drippings, 1 tablespoon white wine vinegar, ½ clove garlic, ¼ teaspoon onion salt and 2 dashes hot red-pepper sauce. Dress salad and toss lightly. Makes 4 good servings, each 100 calories.

"Dieters dream of desserts," says JAYNE MEADOWS. "And I'm no exception. So I'm making a file of low-calorie desserts. Really good ones—like Wheat-Germ Crisps." These "nutty" cookies are 33 calories each. One brownie is 200.

WHEAT-GERM CRISPS: Cream together ½ cup margarine, or ½ cup butter, and 2 cups brown sugar. Beat in 2 eggs. Then add ½ cup each buttermilk and wheat germ. Sift together 2½ cups flour, 1 teaspoon each baking soda and salt, and fold into the batter. Last, flavor with 1 teaspoon vanilla. Drop from a half teaspoon onto a greased baking sheet and bake for 10 minutes in a hot oven, 400° F. Makes about 10 dozen cookies.

Calorie curbing can be fun. It's all how you go about it. Forget about semistarvation, a subsistence on celery sticks. Take your cue from the stars—dramatize your diet dishes with unusual combinations of low-calorie foods and lose weight.

souper special

BUDGET BEATERS

Budget Beater:

SOUPER CASSEROLE!

This is the way to please your family . . . and please your purse, too! Chicken Noodle Casserole. Fix this in the morning — heat it at night. In 1½-qt. casserole blend 1 can Campbell's Cream of Chicken Soup with ⅓ cup milk. Add 1 cup cooked cubed chicken (or 5-oz. can of Swanson's Boned Chicken), 1 cup each cooked medium noodles and cooked green beans, 1 tsp. minced onion, top with buttered bread crumbs. Bake at 400° F. about 25 min. 4 servings. If desired, top casserole with a tomato slice before baking.

SOUPER CASSEROLE VARIATION: Tuna with Cream of Celery Soup

Budget Beater:

SOUPER SCRAMBLE!

This is the way to make eggs different every day for the cost of a can of soup! Souper Mushroom Scramble. Stir one can Campbell's Cream of Mushroom Soup until smooth; blend with 8 slightly beaten eggs, dash black pepper. Melt 2 tbsp. shortening in skillet; pour in egg mixture. Cook slowly till eggs set, stirring now and then. 4 servings. Garnish top with sprinkle of shredded cheese or chopped parsley. Hint: Makes a souper budget beater for a meatless meal.

SOUPER SCRAMBLE VARIATIONS: Vegetable Scramble with Vegetable Soup • Chicken Scramble with Cream of Chicken Soup • Celery Scramble with Cream of Celery Soup

Good n' thrifty cooks cook with Campbell's Soups

For other Budget Beaters write to Campbell Soup Company, Department (LH6), Camden 1, N. J.

No jam tastes like the kind you make yourself!

It's easy . . . thrifty . . . and no failures with Sure-Jell or Certo!

Sure-Jell and Certo are brands of pectin . . . the fruit substance that causes jelling. The amount of pectin in fruits varies—so Sure-Jell or Certo takes the guesswork out of jam and jelly making. Easy recipes for all kinds of fruit with package and bottle.

Recipe for Strawberry Jam. Chop 2 quarts fully ripe berries. Mix 4½ cups prepared fruit in large saucepan with 1 box Sure-Jell. (Or use liquid Certo—recipe on bottle.) Stir over high heat until mixture comes to hard boil. Next step is even easier!

Stir in 7 cups sugar, at once. Bring to full rolling boil, then boil hard 1 minute, stirring constantly. This short boil time means less juice boils away. So you get up to 50% higher yield—and fresher flavor! Tastes so much better than any jam you can buy!

Remove from heat, alternately stir and skim off foam for 5 min. Ladle quickly into 11 medium-size jars. (No paraffining with new type jars!) Costs mere pennies a jar—and you can't fail! Get powdered Sure-Jell or liquid Certo—products of General Foods.

ICE PALACE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 58

tell you this, Thor Storm. It's getting so a person asks you a simple question, like do you think it's going to rain, and they get a lecture on Alaska. I start out about Chris and this boy, and I end up listening to scientific laboratories. All right. Where were we at? Oh, yes. Chris has seen more of Alaska than any woman of seventy in the territory. Then what?"

"Then she's on her own."

"If I had my way she wouldn't be sitting up there in front with Ross this minute, let alone deciding her own life. Anyway, a pilot's got no right to be talking to a girl when he's flying real risky terrain like this."

With the too pat timing of a badly constructed play, Ross' voice now came over the loud-speaker in the plane's cabin.

"Your attention please. This is an unusually clear day. No fog in the valley. This flight can continue directly to Barrow on schedule, but we are a little ahead of time . . . (squawk squawk squawk) . . . or take a brief side trip to see the Diomedes—the Big Diomede and the Little Diomede . . . (squawk squawk) . . . If you will make your wishes known to your stewardess ——"

In the cockpit Chris said, "I hope they will. I'm sure grampa and Bridie would love it. Do you think the others will say yes?"

"Six of them are Dew Line men. They'll go anywhere. Then there're two Eskimos who live in Barrow, they're crazy about flying, they'd go to the moon. And that vaudeville couple that latched on at the last moment, they're game."

"What do you suppose they are? Russian spies or something?"

"No, I think they crave excitement and danger. And now that their act has been cut down, they miss the thrills. I've seen a lot of people like that bitten by Alaska."

"Grampa Thor says the people who came to America two or three hundred years ago were like that. Adventurous."

"'Grampa says.' You talk like a little girl. I never knew anybody with so many grandfathers."

"You know perfectly well they've been my father and mother and sisters and brothers too."

"I know, I know. All your life a bunch of people have been cooing over you—not only your family but everybody in Baranof—saying, 'Poor little Chris, got no papa, got no mamma.' You're a big girl now."

"You're nervous. Am I doing something wrong?" She pretended to scan the instrument panel. "Goodness gracious, Mr. Guildenstern, how do you get this thing down?"

"I don't get nervous in planes, Miss Storm. Though I'm going to take over in a minute because buzzing the Diomedes is kind of nervous work. I'd hate to see you try to make a landing in that mush below us this minute."

"You don't scare me."

"That's right. After all, there's nothing to flying but taking off and landing. Keep the plane up in the air forever and you'll never get hurt. That's my motto."

"You are nervous."

She stood up now. He shifted into the pilot's seat. "This time next year you'll probably be raving about Mount Rainier and all those high buildings, and the dances at the Olympic Hotel. And Bayard Husack."

She was standing behind him as he sat in his proper place. "Why didn't you ever tell me you had a son? It seems so strange you never told me you had a son."

"I was afraid I'd lose you."

"You can't lose what you ——" She caught herself. Stopped.

"—— what you haven't got," he finished for her.

"Ross, how old was he when your wife died?"

"He was two. Not quite two."

The cockpit door opened. The stewardess, a cup in her hand. "Everybody says they'd love to see the Diomedes. Here's your coffee, Captain Guildenstern."

"Tell Ackerman, will you, Miss Larson, that my temporary copilot is leaving."

Almost as if he had taken her by the shoulders, pushed her firmly through the cockpit door and had closed the door after her, she felt that he had shut her out of his consciousness for the time, at least. He was looking straight ahead. He was hunched a little over the instrument panel.

"I think you'd better take your seat, Miss Storm," the stewardess said. "And fasten your seat belt. Sometimes it gets a little bumpy around here."

Ackerman, the copilot, passed her at the doorway. "Why don't you stay and see the Diomedes from here, Miss Storm?"

"I've been fired."

Bridie surveyed her with a searching ice-blue eye. "You want to sit here with me? Or with your grampa?"

"I'll sit back here alone."

Miss Larson's cool, inadequate voice now came over the loud-speaker, her every important word seeming to be lost in a maddening way by the roar of the engines.

". . . about ten minutes . . . see . . . the Big Diomede . . . Russia . . . America . . . villages . . . coast . . . Siberia ——"

Thor Storm stood upright. He strode over to the stewardess. "Ask Ross if I can take over. Don't be offended. I'll explain later. . . . I'll ask him." His voice ricocheted from side to side of the plane's cabin. It boomed through the aisle, it shamed the engine's roar.

"Ross! Ross out there! Will you let me give this little lecture? It's Christine—I want Christine to know about this historic sight while she's seeing it. . . . That's good, my boy. I knew you'd ——"

"I'll tell you what I think," Christine said furiously, to Bridie. "I think grampa is getting queerer and queerer."

"He's just getting older and older," Bridie whispered, "and so am I."

"In a few minutes now," Thor Storm roared, "you'll see a sight few have seen. You'll see thousands of years of history and the world today meeting on two island rocks rising from the sea. They are two miles apart, separated only by a narrow strip of water. Over the Big Diomede flies the flag of Soviet Russia. Over the Little Diomede flies the flag of the United States of America. And beyond these you will see a dark cliff of shore line. This is Siberia. These two little islands are all that is left of what was a stretch of continuous land that once, thousands of years ago, connected and united Asia and America. These islands are only bleak rocks, each rising to mountainous heights with a sheer drop into the deep sea. Snow, ice and black water. But people live on these rocks and have for thousands of years. There's a schoolhouse on the Big Diomede, taught by a Russian schoolteacher, and a schoolhouse on the Little Diomede taught by an American teacher. It is said that if an American plane flew over the Big Diomede it would be fired on, and if a Russian plane were to appear over the Little Diomede it would risk American fire. Here in this plane we needn't worry. Our pilot knows his craft ——"

"I think somebody should stop grampa," Chris whispered.

"Sh! It's real interesting," Bridie said.

"—— but the natives visit back and forth in their skin boats. They have radios, they have phonographs, mechanical luxuries of all kinds. Once they lived in comparative peace, separated by distance and natural obstacles. Now they are united by the inventions of modern science and torn apart by fear of each other.

"This is why I wanted to talk to you passengers with me on this trip. When you look down, like gods, on the Diomede Islands you are not only looking at two little islands. You are looking at the whole world today ——"

The plane began to bank.

From the Roller Polars there came a little salvo of applause. They knew entertainment when they saw and heard it. But the other passengers pressed against the windows of the plane with a complete concentration of attention.

Christine, alone at a window, turned and called to Thor, "Come sit here with me, Grampa Thor, please."

He sat beside her. Together they peered out toward the gray sheet that lay ahead.

"It was wonderful of you to do that, just for this little handful of people."

"It's all in my book, dear child. And I'll write a piece about this trip for the paper next week."

He smiled down at her and suddenly, high up there in the merciless light of the polar Arctic day, skylit, sunlit, dustless, refractive, she saw the lines, the vague shadows, the receding of the flesh pads around the eye sockets, the cheekbones. It was as though she had not actually seen him for a long time. He doesn't look very well, she thought worriedly. And then, suddenly stricken with the thought, Why, he's an old man!

Like a little girl, "I love you, Grampa Thor," she said.

"Thank you, my dear child."

Their heads turned toward the window. Two black rocks jutted out of a gray-black sea. At this height it appeared that only a few inches of water separated the two bits of rocky land.

"Why, say," Alwin Polar exclaimed, "a kid could spit from one island to the other."

One of the Dew Line men laughed a trifle uncomfortably. "Hey, I hope our pilot don't get mixed up which is which."

Even as they gazed down, fascinated, the passengers seemed imperceptibly to shrink away from the windows as though by this distribution of weight they could veer the plane away from the direction of danger. Then, in the distance, meeting the sky line, they saw across the sluggish icy waste of waters a menacing black clifflike mass. It was the coast of Siberia.

"Thor Storm," Bridie trumpeted from her seat, "you tell Ross Guildenstern to turn this plane around and head back where we belong."

But already the plane was making its graceful, birdlike turn as it circled and banked and straightened out.

"It's all right," said Miss Larson. "We're heading for Barrow, we'll be there in no time. Coffee will be served to any passengers desiring it."

"Well, I'll tell you," Alwin Polar observed. "I'm not a drinking man as a rule, but the way I feel, coffee wouldn't settle me. I could do with a little slug."

There was a subtle change now in the plane. The icy drafts cut through every unseen chink and crevice. Coats and parkas, mufflers and blankets were pulled closer, tucked more tightly. Soon, on either side, rose the formidable walls of the mountains and, below, the tundra that never had known the foot of man.

"Coffee?" chirped the stewardess. "Snack? These are the meat sandwiches."

They drank the hot beverage. They ate the cold food. They seemed, huddled in that bleak little cabin, to be somehow separate, each from the other, busy with their own thoughts. Boomboomboomboomboom went the engines. Sleepsleepsleepsleepsleep. But they could not in all that clear fine air and that brilliance. But perhaps they did, at least in the more active fibers of the senses. For Miss Larson was saying, "Fasten your seat belts, please," and the sign over the cockpit doorway was alight with its message.

Barrow. The Arctic Ocean. "We are coming down in Barrow. We will arrive there in ten minutes. Barrow is the northernmost town in Alaska, and the only sizable settlement between here and the North Pole. You will now notice the Arctic Ocean; the dark line you see is the Arctic ice pack piled up on the shore almost mountain high."

"In July!" exclaimed Irma Polar.

"We have enjoyed having you on this trip," Miss Larson went on, "and we hope you have enjoyed your flight with Arctic Circle Air Line, and that you will fly with us again. Please keep your seats until the plane ——"

They stepped from the plane into a gray-and-black world whose only flash of color was the United States flag whipping aloft in the wind.

Bridie on one side, Thor on the other, Chris stood a moment, staring. "It's Mars."

Thor laughed in approval. "That's a good observation, Christine."

Bridie, absurdly inappropriate as to outer appearance, superbly equipped for hardship in spirit and body, hunched her shoulders against the wind. "You wanted to see Alaska."

Christine surveyed the forest of empty oil drums stretching away to infinity, the ice pack stacked high on the Arctic shore, the huts, the weather-pocked frame houses, the sod huts, the Quonsets. A town on Mars.

"I thought—I suppose—it would be a little like Oogruk and a little like Kotzebue and Nome and even Baranof. All those engineers and all those scientists and the Army, and the Air Force. What do they do here?"

"Protect you," Thor said.

"I'd thank them to protect me this minute," Bridie announced, "with a place where we can get warmed up and away from the wind. What's that place over there? If it's the airport, let's get to it."

"Chris! Chris!"

She turned. Ross was running toward them.

"I'm going in," Bridie announced firmly. "Ross wants to talk to you, let him come indoors."

Chris waved him forward as they turned toward the wooden structure that served the airport. But, "Wait! Wait!" Ross called.

"Please go on," Chris said. "I'll be there in a minute." She stood, waiting.

Whether from running or the whip of the wind, there was a flush in his cheeks that heightened his tawny good looks.

"I'm going back," he said. Then, as she stared, uncomprehending, "Now, I mean. I've been demoted for six weeks."

"Why? Demoted to—for ——"

His smile was rueful, but it had a tinge of triumph too. "You know this wasn't my regular run. I swapped with Ogilvie. I wanted to be with you in Oogruk, to show you ——"

Their talk, to a listener, would now have seemed to have the non sequitur of a Chekhov play dialogue.

"Your grandmother and your aunt."

"I wanted you to see."

"And the boy."

"I should have told you before, but I hadn't the courage."

"I talk like a little girl, you said. You treat me like one."

"You're going to marry Bay Husack, aren't you?"

"I'm not going to marry anybody. Just now. I can't imagine being married to Bay Husack or anybody."

"Yes, you can. Every time you meet an attractive guy you think what it would be like to be married to him. Every girl does."

"I've never seen Bayard Husack in my life. He doesn't know I exist."

"He doesn't have to. It's all arranged. Husack heir, Seattle money; Kennedy heiress, Alaska money. Like royalty."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 77

Blend chicken broth with Kraft Mayonnaise

¼ cup cold chicken broth blended with 1 cup Kraft Mayonnaise gives you a wonderful new dressing for chicken salad

...and make your chicken salad famous!

Kraft Mayonnaise is specially made to blend with other ingredients. It's lightly seasoned, so it doesn't overwhelm the delicate flavor of such things as chicken broth.

And its texture is smooth as velvet . . . so unusually smooth and fluffy that Kraft's is the easiest mixing mayonnaise you ever tried.

There's no curdling, no separating, with Kraft Mayonnaise. Your mixture is completely blended . . . and it stays that way, even if you keep it for days.

Kraft's is true mayonnaise, made with lots of eggs and extra egg yolks, too. But it takes more than eggs to make mayonnaise mix like Kraft's. Only Kraft's own blend of oils and special beating process can give such velvet texture.

No other mayonnaise mixes like Velvet Texture Krafts!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 75

"How silly! We can't stand here. When are you going to be back in Baranof?"

"I'm in the doghouse. I just heard. They're giving me six weeks on a bush-crate run between Kotzebue and a dozen little dog-sled villages. I'll be carting the Native Service visiting nurses and the dentists and doctors and sick Eskimos up and down for the next six weeks."

They stood silent, facing each other. "You mean you're leaving now?"

"They're fueling up. Look, I'll have to run for it. You'll be in Seattle, probably, by the time I get back to Baranof. Won't you?"

"I suppose so."

"I've got to go. Can you make it to the airport all right?"

"Of course."

"Fascinating ethnological fact. In the Eskimo language there's no word for good-by." He ran swiftly toward the waiting plane.

Letter from Czar Kennedy to Dave Husack.
August 12, 1953

Dear Dave: I am writing this longhand and mailing it to the house instead of the office because this letter is for you and Louisa both. It was mighty kind of you to offer to take my Christine in to live at your beautiful house during her first year at the university. I would have liked that fine and it would have been a wonderful thing for Christine, but Christine says she has to live in a college dorm.

I have got that old puffpot Thor to let Christine come to Seattle a little early before school really starts so she can kind of get settled in and comfortable and I would like to bring her down myself about August 25. I will be at the Olympic as usual, but if Christine stays on like we plan then I would be mighty thankful if she could visit at your place till we get things set up for her.

I won't beat around the bush; another reason why I want to come down I want to get a look at the Buccaneer. I know she made that trial trip in good shape and I understand she's tied up at the Seattle docks waiting to go into dry dock for stripping for next season. I bet old B. J. Granett is whirling in his grave like a top. I have only seen pictures of her, she sure must have been a humdinger of a beautiful yacht in her day, well her champagne and caviar and Riviera days are over, they strip her down in dry dock get the excess weight off her, why I bet she can carry more fish out of Alaska and into the hoppers than any twenty tenders and that's a fact. Christine would like to see her, too, so let's make a kind of party of it, my treat. Let me know if this is inconvent and I will make plans otherwise.

Faithfully yours,
ZEBEDEE (CZAR) KENNEDY

"They're good," Louise Husack announced at the end of what Dina termed the style show, "but they're dowdy."

Dowdy. Christine had never actually heard this old-fashioned term used before, and certainly never as applied to her own clothes. As she stood now in her good black nylon slip, edged with good black lace, her face reflected a shocked unbelief. This adjective was used to describe her Baranof-bought college outfit. Instinctively, protectively her bare arms hugged herself, a palm cupping either elbow. The narrow black line of the slip's shoulder straps accented the firm fine beauty of her arms and her breast. Her hair, as the result of having had dresses and blouses dragged over its lavish golden mass, now tumbled in confusion. Her face had taken on a flush unusual in that clear peach-colored skin.

Dina Drake, staring pitilessly at this girl standing in Louise Husack's overstuffed rose-colored bedroom, realized that here was a human structure as nearly flawless in youth, health, intelligence, beauty and artlessness as such an example can be. She felt a sudden sharp stricture as though an unseen needle had darted a stitch through her heart.

Chris remembered now what Czar had said before she left Baranof for Seattle: "Listen, Bridie. I want Christine to have the best. Dresses and coats and so on. None of this parka-and-mukluk stuff. That's fine for Alaska, but Seattle is different."

Now, standing before her two Seattle inquisitors, Chris flung her arms out in a gesture of explanation and protest, mingled. "But Bridie and I bought them just before I came here. We get the new autumn styles early in Baranof because it gets cold the end of August or early Septem—— Why, the Hollywood Fashion Shop and the Miss and Mrs. Baranof Shop get the newest California sports things and even New York styles ordered absolutely direct."

The rose-colored bed, the satin chairs were atumble with dresses, sweaters, blouses.

Dina looked at the girl's hair. Her eyes narrowed. She smiled amusedly though her tone was kind. "Poor kid, you'll have to chop that stuff off, to begin with."

"Chop what?"

"That floor mop. Honestly, child, I haven't seen anything like that since they stopped reading me Goldilocks and the Three Bears."

Louise Husack, who had been examining a pink silk party dress, now looked up at Christine and then, slowly, her gaze turned toward Dina.

"Why, Christine's hair is lovely. Don't you let anybody cut it, Christine."

Dina stood up. She adjusted her waistline and stretched her neck from side to side as though bored and finished with it all.

"Let me know if I can help. Most of the good shops and the department heads know me." She turned away with a small, properly stifled yawn, then turned back to face the girl. "But if you're going to buy some things that aren't tacky, you'll have to take off some of that fat first."

"Fat! I wear size twelve!"

"I'm an eight."

There came a discreet knock at the closed door. "It's the coffee." Louise Husack's tone had the greedy anticipation of the caffeine addict. "Come in."

"What's going on here?" Bayard Husack leaned against the doorway.

Dina walked toward him. She just placed her fingers against his cheek, gently, as a wife might greet a husband, home from a day at the office. "What timing, Bay!"

Louise Husack was scandalized. "Bayard Husack, get right out of here!"

"Why?"

"Because Chris is trying on clothes, that's why."

Christine did not cringe or wrap herself in her arms or otherwise display maidenly confusion at being viewed by male eyes while wearing a good black slip that came well down below her knees and well up above her breasts. She was cross and upset. "Hi, Bay," she said spiritlessly.

Bay remained negligently leaning against the doorway. Dina now put a hand on his shoulder and, just as negligently, leaned against him.

A dull, unbecoming flush so rare in the elderly now suffused Louise Husack's ocherous cheeks. She gave a poor performance of shocked propriety. "Barging into my bedroom and staring at a young girl!"

"Ladies," Bayard Husack said, "pardon my mom. She's got a dirty mind. The truth is, Christine, that girls in slips and girls in those strapless evening jobs and even girls in Bikinis and a couple of clamshells—in fact, especially girls in those sordid gadgets—simply don't attract me. But just let me see a girl wrapped up from head to foot like a laundry bundle! That brings out the beast in me."

From the pile of garments on the bed Christine now dug out a bulky navy-blue chain-knit sweater with a turtle-neck collar. This she pulled over her head, thrust her arms into the thick sleeves, and jerked its folds well down over her hips.

"I brought three parkas with me from Alaska," she announced.

"Looks to me as if one would do it."

Dina gave a definitely bad performance of an indulgent laugh. "Don't pay any attention to him, Chris. He's just a sheep in wolf's clothing."

"And don't think," Bay added genially, "that when Lucrezia died the whole Borgia line passed out."

Dina turned her head. "You're getting to be as catty as a woman."

He reached up and gently took her hand from his shoulder.

"What's going on here!" demanded a bewildered Louise.

"Your coffee, mom," Bay said. The maid bumped her inexpert way into the room, a laden tray in her hands. "Here. I'll take that."

Chris cleared a low stand and dragged it to the side of Louise's chair. Bay set the tray down.

"Who wants coffee?" Louise Husack poured herself a cup and drank half the steaming beverage. She put down the cup and exhaled a deep breath.

Chris had learned something of the ways of the elderly in her almost twenty years of life. "Would you like me to pour it? Would you like a cup, Dina?"

"No, but I'd like a drink. I'll stop on my way downstairs. I'm late. Coming, Bay?"

"Nope."

Dina had turned to leave. Now she stood a moment, arrested in the doorway. Louise Husack picked up a sandwich. "Coffee, Chris dear? Try one of these."

"No thanks. But I'd love a Coke. I'm thirsty after all those clothes."

"It's an act," Dina Drake said cryptically. She was off down the stairway.

"A Coke." Bay Husack repeated the word paternally. "Come on, kid. I'll get it for you."

Louise called after them, "Remember you've got to be dressed by six. Your grandpa and Mr. Husack are meeting us at the dock. You coming with us, Bayard?"

"Why not?"

Christine picked up an armload of the rejected dresses. "I'd better not bother about the Coke, thank you."

"Here, give me those. You pick up another load. What is all this stuff, anyway?"

"They're my clothes—they were my clothes—for the winter. And now they're tacky."

He looked at her over the pile of garments. "As far as I'm concerned, you're wearing a parka this minute."

Laden, they staggered down the hall to her bedroom.

"Where do you want these?"

"Just throw them on the bed."

"Get into one of the tacky dresses and drive down to the dock with me. How about it?"

"I'm going down with Aunt Louise—she told me to call her Aunt Louise—and the others, whoever you are."

"More fun with me."

"Look, I'm here in Seattle to go to school. I'm just here as your guest for two weeks—and mighty nice of you, as Grampa Czar says—but please don't get me mixed up, would you please?"

"Do you always talk like this?"

"Like what?"

"Like a kind of verbal prize fighter. Do the Alaska boys like it?"

"They love it. Ask anybody."

Now he was leaning against her doorway, as he had in his mother's room. Chris was hanging the despised garments neatly in her closet, jabbing the clothes hangers into the sleeves with more force than was necessary.

He stood a moment longer in the doorway. He took a handful of keys from a pocket and jingled them in his palm and thrust them back. "We'll be leaving about a quarter of six. The boat's going to be slimy and the Olympic dining room dressy, so that poses a nice question for you. Maybe one of your medium-tacky numbers. Do you want that Coke?"

"I'd love it. I'll go down."

"I'll send Kea up with it." He turned away. "See you." He closed the door behind him.

On the drive down to the docks she found herself seated beside him. This rather surprised her. She had meant to be with Mrs. Husack in the back seat. Now Dina was there. Dina had demurred, certainly, though sotto voce, and Bay had said with what Chris considered very bad manners, "Stop wrestling and do as I say or we'll be late. I hate being late."

There was silence in the car as they sped down the twisting hill road. She felt vaguely uncomfortable, but her desire for information always had been stronger than her caution.

"The Buccaneer—tell me a little about her, will you? I know she was a beautiful ship—a yacht—one of the biggest and most expensive in the world. Grampa Czar says they're going to gut her and use her for a fish carrier."

"That's it. She was the finest privately owned ship in the world in her day. Nobody wants a ship like that these days, even those Greek billionaires. She's been lying around useless for years."

"Do you think we can have a little ride on her tonight, before dinner?" Chris asked. "I'd love it."

"No, you wouldn't. Wait till you see her. They took her out on a trial trip for capacity before they started to strip her. She's a real mess now."

"I don't see how they could do it."

"Oh, it's simple. Knock down partitions, all that fancy woodwork, the saloon and bedrooms were lined with satin brocade ——"

Ask any WOMAN

By Marcelene Cox

Accident: an event frequently descended from a long line of advice not listened to.

She's the kind of woman who thinks that culture in a family is synonymous with parsley on a plate.

Connoisseur: one who is able to make a distinction between knickknack, bric-a-brac and bibelot.

Let the sorrowing heart cry aloud, if it can; the heart that bleeds internally may cause greater damage.

Overheard: "She thinks she's prevaricating when she tells the truth."

One reason a women's convention should always be a three-day affair is that not until the third day, when all the women get back into their first-day suits, is everyone sure who everyone is.

For a child, a legacy better than gold
Is to teach him early to do what he's told.

The experienced parent butters only the center of a child's piece of bread.

Two young girls overheard:
"I lost a whole year of my life."
"Why, how?"
"Well—I was nineteen before I found out that when I was eighteen I was my own boss."

Amusement and fun are as necessary in forming the well-balanced child as nectar is in making honey.

Wise woman: one who keeps still when she knows she isn't.

The difference between a housewife and a career woman is only about twenty pounds.

"I don't mean that. I mean I don't see how anyone who cares about ships—I mean a ship that was the most beautiful yacht in the world ——"

"Fish companies aren't quite that sentimental."

The ship lay at the dock—the once bustling colorful docks over which the glinting airplanes now flew so tauntingly, so derisively. Those docks had known ships from India, from China, from Japan, from exotic islands and tropical seas. Seattle no longer was host to these strange craft.

The Buccaneer lay at the dockside. Neglected and idle for years, scabrous now and dirt-dimmed, the bone structure and the lines were still there, the breeding and distinction persisted. She looked vast, even now, among the little fishing boats and the squat tubs in from Victoria or the islands.

The four occupants of the Husack car—Louise Husack, Bayard, Dina, Christine—had a glimpse of the ship from the hilltop. As they drove down to the docks and into the company pier, two rubber-booted figures came toward them down the gangway. Czar Kennedy and Dave Husack, grinning, jubilant, waved a greeting.

"You'll have to wear boots," Dave yelled. His color, always roseate, had the purplish tinge of excitement. In one hand he carried what seemed to be a gold picture frame, and jumbled in his arms were miscellaneous articles of footgear. "Here. We scrounged a bunch of old mukluks and boots. You fit 'em onto the girls, Bay, best you can."

Dina looked with disdain at the clumsy dirty boots. "I wear fours, and I'd rather ruin my pumps than get into those horrors."

Cradled in one arm Czar Kennedy carried a dark-green gold-topped bottle. He held it up now. "Champagne. Domestic but champagne all right. We'll have the real stuff at dinner, to celebrate, but you're going to break this over the bow, Christine, for luck."

Something in Chris was outraged at this. "You only do that when the boat is young and—and beautiful!"

"She's better than young," Czar said. "She's old and rich. She rates a bottle of champagne. She's worth her weight in gold—or silver salmon, anyway."

Dave turned the gold frame so that the picture it enclosed faced the newcomers. "Look at that, will you! It was hanging in one of the stateroom closets, can you beat that! The whole crowd of muckamucks, you'll die!"

It was a group photograph showing a party of men and women on deck. They seemed strangely naïve in their costumes of another day. The women wore long skirts and little jackets with broad revers, and floppy hats with floating veils. The mustached men wore yachting caps and tight suits. "Look at the date!" Dave yelled. "That's the day the Buccaneer was launched. Look, there's old B. J. himself. They're all dead now. But we ain't. Come on, folks. We'll take a look around and then over to the Olympic. But first you're going to bust this bottle over the bow, Christine."

Clumping along in the clumsy misfitting boots, Christine protested mildly. "I don't know how. I wish somebody else ——"

"Don't look at me, thanks." Dina linked an arm through Bay's.

He extricated his arm, apparently to remove a handkerchief from his pocket. "Here, we'll have to wrap a couple of handkerchiefs or something around the bottle and tie them. Somebody give me another. Dad?" Dave snatched a fine linen square from his pocket. For a moment the fishy dock smell was lost in a wave of spicy eau de Cologne. "I don't want any broken glass making hamburgers of Christine."

The little party stood looking up at the scrofulous bow of the old ship. Gingerly Chris took the bottle in one gloved hand. The others were grouped around her. As she swung her arm forward the loosely knotted handkerchiefs fluttered to the ground, the big bottle slipped in her gloved hand and fell with a smart smack into the waters of the bay.

"That's bad luck!" Dave Husack shouted.

Czar's voice: "Easy now, Dave. Easy."

Chris closed her eyes a moment, opened them wide and wet. "I'm so sorry." She set her jaw a little, she looked at Dina. "I'm sure you could have done it beautifully."

"Forget it, Christine," Czar said shortly.

Louise Husack seemed relieved. "I'm glad it's over. It was a silly notion anyway. If we're going over the boat, let's go and get through with it and have dinner."

Christine stood a moment, staring down into the water as though expecting to see the big green bottle bobbing and taunting her there. An arm, friendly and protective, brushed across her shoulders. She looked around at Bay.

"You did that purposely."

"I did not!"

"I don't mean you did it purposely on purpose. I mean you wanted to do it and you couldn't help it. It was done when Czar first gave you the bottle."

"Oh." Did he think she was a little idiot who knew nothing about Freud and Jung and everything after two years at Baranof College? "Oh, that. Psychologically. Yes, I suppose so." She dusted one gloved hand with the other to rid her hand of the memory, as she had seen people do it in a play.

THE TACITURN TYPE

By PHILENE HAMMER

Three there be—and only three—
Who know the inner soul of me:
Dear (my husband), Doc McNair,
And Bessie Mae, who does my hair.

My symptoms, my financial plights,
My nightmares and my sleepless nights
Discriminately I relay
To Dear. And Doc. And Bessie Mae.

Yet even so, a gal should be Entitled to some privacy:
Thus, there are realms of which, I fear,
I never speak to Doc or Dear.

"You get cuter by the minute."

"Oh, do shut up." Suddenly she felt older and wiser than he—than anyone in the group now plodding up the gangway.

"Is that the way you talk to the Baranof boys?"

"I'm not in Baranof."

"But you wish you were."

She glanced quickly around. The others were ahead of them. "No, I don't. I thought I would. I did for a little while. But now I don't."

Czar turned at the ship's rail. He made a gesture of urging to the two loiterers. "Come on, come on, Chris! Don't keep us waiting."

"Can we go for a ride?" Christine asked as she stepped on deck.

They laughed tolerantly at this. Dave Husack thrust one great paw forward and pinched her cheek. "Listen to the kid. The Buccaneer's going out at eight o'clock, headed for dry dock, but we're not going out on her. We'll be eating a good thick steak at the Olympic, I hope." He stuck his head in at the door of the great saloon. "Hey, boys, I brought you company. Ladies."

The wreckers were working overtime. They hacked with hammers and crowbars and drills and acetylene torches and they had almost finished stripping this once magnificent room down to its aged bones. It had been gutted. The saloon and smoking room and cabin partitions had been torn away to make room for the millions of fish that would bring millions of dollars to the Husacks and the Caswells and the Kennedys and the Kleets and the men at the directors' tables in Washington and New York and San Francisco. The passageways and dining rooms that had held the aroma of exquisite foods and vintage wines now reeked of the fish that had piled up on that first trial trip. Men in hip boots slid and slipped on the slime of the floor.

"Take your ma's arm, Bay," Dave said.

Now and then the ship seemed to quiver as with a chill. "It's the blowtorches," Bay explained. "I don't think they ought to use them until they're in dry dock."

Dave Husack corrected this. "No it isn't. This machinery in this little skiff was built like a watch, like one of those fine Swiss watches. That's why it cost the old boy about a million a minute to run her. Well, our fish ain't so delicate. We yanked out the delicate works and we put in some good serviceable secondhand junk that will make the old tub go and that's all we need. Any old grease monkey can run her engine now. She's good for another ten—fifteen—maybe twenty years."

Dina's skirts were lifted high above the slime of the decks. She had picked her way so fastidiously from place to place that her pretty black pumps were spotless, her lovely silken legs unflecked. "Uncle Dave, you're just a wizard." She placed one hand on his shoulder as though to balance herself.

Czar's cold voice: "You familiar with the cannery business, Miss—uh ——"

Dave's laugh boomed out. "Say, she ought to be by now. She's handled enough correspondence and heard enough gab about it."

Louise Husack sometimes surprised you. "We've seen this ship now. Enough's enough. I'll take my salmon at the Olympic with a nice martini cocktail on the side."

Bay grinned. "That's telling 'em, kid." He steered her toward the gangway, threw a glance over his shoulder at the others. "Come on, you young fry."

"Right!" Dave bellowed. "Anyway, they're pushing off for Spruce in another hour. We'll find ourselves in the middle of Elliott Bay if we don't watch it."

The headwaiter at the entrance to the handsome dining room was a name dropper. "Good evening, Mr. Husack. We have your table, Mr. Husack. This way, Mr. Husack." There were red roses in a bowl on Mr. Husack's table, two dark-green bottles, wire-capped, stuck their necks just above the wine bucket's bed of ice. A round table laid for six. Though its circular shape did not provide for a head or foot, Dave Husack gave the effect of being at the head of the table. Louise at his right, Christine at his left, Bay, Dina, Czar in a neat ring.

"If there's one thing I like," Dave boomed, "it's a great big steak that thick. How about it, Emil? Say, take away those roses, will you, boy? They always give me hay fever or rose fever or whatever it is in August. And get those pink lights off, too, while you're about it. I can't see only the top of Dina's head."

Two deep lines extending from nostrils to chin seemed carved in the gray-white of Czar Kennedy's face. His eyes were flat, gray, expressionless as oysters. He lifted one forefinger. He stared at Emil, the headwaiter, and the man found himself staring back as though hypnotized. Czar did not raise his voice.

"You. Come here." The man skirted the table, he stood at Czar's side. "Kennedy," he said, "is my name. I am giving this dinner. I ordered it this morning."

"Yes, Mr. Kennedy. Certainly, Mr. Kennedy, I wasn't here at the time, but—when I saw Mr. Husack ——"

"Listen to me. Mrs. Husack, I have taken the liberty of ordering the dinner. I find scattered ordering unsatisfactory, but if there is anything you do not approve, it will be changed. . . . Don't take those lights away, man. And stand still. . . . I have ordered imported caviar, black. Martinis or vodka, though I'm taking bourbon and so can anyone else. Three-inch steaks, so there'll be plenty even for you, Dave, rare, medium or well done. Those baked potatoes the way they do 'em here. Mushrooms and peas. A big salad with Roquefort dressing. And for dessert, of course"—he looked around the table, he suddenly turned on them his winning smile—"a baked Alaska."

"Yes sir, Mr. Kennedy," Emil agreed smoothly.

Well, Chris thought, that's telling 'em, Grampa Czar. She looked at him, a sparkling glance of impulsive admiration.

Czar looked at the girl. He spoke casually: "When our drinks arrive we'll have a toast ——"

"—— to the Buccaneer!" Dave finished for him.

Smoothly Czar continued as though Dave had not spoken: "—— to our most gracious friend, Louise Husack. And after that I'll be glad if perhaps you, Bay, will propose a toast to our little student here."

A moment of somewhat eerie silence fell upon the table.

"I love a man who can order a delicious dinner," Dina said. Czar, seated at her left, did not turn his head.

Emil put a tentative hand on the rose bowl, with an inquiring glance at Czar. Czar nodded, wordlessly. "Too bad," Louise Husack said, with a somewhat poisonous glance at her husband. "I bet you don't see roses like that up in Alaska."

Christine's low, charming voice seemed to clear the air of embarrassment. "Not like those, Aunt Louise. Such dear little things. That's the trouble with all our Alaska flowers, I suppose, except the tiny ones that grow on the tundra. Vegetables too. The flowers are the size of cabbages and the cabbages are as big as bushel baskets. The strawberries are three inches around and the delphinium grows nine feet high."

Bay said, "I hope the Husack family knows when it's licked."

The cocktails, the caviar, the steak, the champagne; an hour—two hours—gone by. The company was relaxed now, and without rancor. The orchestra that had been playing what is known as dinner music now broke its tempo into fragments suited to dancing. Bay asked Chris to dance. She rose with alacrity, whisked to the tiny dance floor, his arm came round her. She said, "I've been simply dying to dance."

Bay said, "Sh-h-h-h." They danced the remainder of the number in silence and returned to the table.

Now the vast dessert arrived, a ceremony, almost a ritual, with three waiters and Emil as acolytes and priest. Baked Alaska, golden, mountainous. Plates were being handed round.

"This is Alaska, all right," Czar said as his fork went into the rich confection. "Layer of cold and layer of hot. Cold and sweet, hot and sweet. Ice cream and cake. People Outside think it's all cold. Well, let 'em. We know better, don't we, Dave!"

But before Dave could agree with more than a preliminary chuckle, a boy in hotel uniform crossed the room and stopped beside Dave's chair. "Telephone, Mr. Husack."

"How's that? . . . Oh. Take the number."

"They said very important, it says." He glanced down at the slip of paper in his hand.

"Oh now, David!" Louise Husack turned protective. "You finish your dinner and tell them to call the house later."

"Go away, boy."

Czar Kennedy viewed this power performance with detachment. Smoothly he picked up the table talk as though the bellboy had not interrupted. "My little Christine isn't used to champagne."

Surprisingly, Dave was receptive to this. "Me neither. It never did agree with me. Champagne is for chorus girls."

"Chorus girls of your day, dad. They don't go for stuff like that now. They're like you, they stick to Scotch."

"My son's quite a stage-door Johnny."

"What's a stage-door Johnny?" Chris asked.

A laugh went round the table in which Chris found herself joining ruefully. "Did I say something?" But even after it was explained she seemed puzzled.

"Just goes to show how far away Alaska really is," Dave said. "Far away and out of step."

The bellboy was at Dave's elbow again and this time he was fortified by Emil. "There are two or three gentlemen—that is, men from the newspapers—to see you, Mr. Husack."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 80

Peach Party Pie boasts a chocolate-y crust plus bright and oh-so-tender Del Monte Peaches

My, but the lovely fresh color of DEL MONTE Peaches does make a dessert sparkle!

And it's a sure promise of richly mellow flavor ahead. Sweet and juicy, marvelously tender—these sunny slices are just about the nicest thing your fork's ever come across.

Tree-ripening—that's what does it. Our peaches are never picked until Nature's had her chance to give them all this color, flavor and tenderness. No exceptions.

That's why DEL MONTE Peaches are the world's favorites. Don't they sound good to you, too?

PEACH PARTY PIE

- 2 cups fine chocolate cooky crumbs (about 27 2¾-in. cookies)
- 5 tablespoons soft butter or margarine
- 1 can (1 lb. 13 oz.) DEL MONTE Brand Sliced Peaches, chilled
- 1 quart of your favorite flavor of ice cream (pistachio is shown here)

With a fork, mix cooky crumbs and the butter until crumbly. Using the back of a spoon, press mixture firmly to bottom and sides of greased 9-inch pie plate, making a shallow rim. Bake 5 minutes in a moderately hot oven (375° F.) and cool on wire rack. Drain peaches. At serving time, spoon ice cream (such as pistachio, strawberry or vanilla) into cooky-crumb crust and top with well-drained DEL MONTE Sliced Peaches.

Del Monte® Peaches

Sliced ■ Halves

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 78

"Do you want me to go for you, dad?"

"Nah."

Dina pushed her chair back. "Let me, Uncle Dave. It's probably Washington. They said tomorrow, but they've probably had a meeting. It's about midnight there."

"I'll go, I'll go. They can't make up their minds because they haven't got any brains. You can't make up minds with ——" He crushed his napkin into a ball. Standing, he grasped the chair back a moment, then wove his way among the tables.

"A liqueur, anybody?" Czar inquired. "How about a nice cream de mint, Louise?"

She laughed plumply. "Now, Czar, I guess you think you're out with one of those chorus girls."

Dina was glancing toward the great doorway. She turned back now to the table. "I've eaten such an enormous dinner, I think I'll just have ▪ brandy, Mr. Kennedy."

"Brandy, eh? Anybodv else want to keep Miss—uh—company?'

"I'll try one, Grampa Czar," Christine told him.

"No, you won't, my girl. You've never tasted brandy."

"Grampa Thor would say this is a good time to try it, then."

The little white flame leaped from his eyes. "Thor has had his day. This is mine. Understand?"

"I'm sorry, grampa. I didn't think you'd be cross about it. You asked."

But now Dave Husack came swiftly toward the table and behind him, like ▪ comet's tail, Emil. Dave's hand on the chairback was shaking. "You keep those reporters out of this room or I'll sue the hotel, hear me!" He sank into the chair.

"David! David! What's happened?"

He glared at them, his lower jaw combative, outjutting, like a troglodyte's. "She's gone. The ship is gone."

"Gone where, David? She was supposed to go at eight, you said, so ——"

"The Buccaneer. She sank. Just like that. Sank."

Czar leaned across the table. He pushed aside the pink-shaded lamp with a gesture that rocked it. "Collision?"

"Here," Dina said. She thrust toward Dave the brandy that the waiter had just placed discreetly at her place.

Dave pushed the glass bubble aside. It overturned and the amber liquid spread on the cloth. "She just went down, I'm telling you. No reason. Daylight. August. Nothing in sight. They say she gave a heave, like, and shivered once, and went down. They saved two men, maybe three. She's gone, absolutely gone. Listen to this."

He unfolded a crumpled wad of newspaper in his hand. "They been trying to get me. The papers. Listen to this. 'She moved out into Elliott Bay, the last rays of the setting sun revealed cruelly every line and bruise and wrinkle and flabby peeling skin of this degraded old hag, once so beautiful, so queenly. Then quietly, smoothly, calmly, like the great lady she was, she staggered once, righted herself, fell forward like a Victorian grande dame in a faint and slipped into the watery depths with a softly hissing sigh of relief. Or was it scorn?'"

He looked up now. The table was silent.

"Millions," Czar said quietly. "She was going to bring in millions. . . . Let's be sensible. It was the machinery. Built like a Swiss watch. That's what you said. And you put in cheap junk engines. You try putting a hunk of iron in a Swiss watch. . . . Those men'll sue. And the dead ones' wives."

"Let's go home, David," Louise Husack said. "Let's go home."

Husack's bloodshot, protuberant eyes found Christine's shocked face and rested there. "Bad luck. I told you it would be. When that bottle slipped out of your silly hand. Bad luck."

Meeting Thor Storm on Gold Street, or dropping in at the Northern Light office, his Baranof townsmen would say, "What's the news of Chris? She given us old sourdoughs the go-by for good? I hear she's going to marry Dave Husack's son."

"Christine hasn't written me about that. Nor Bridie. She writes each of us a long letter once a month. You know Christine. She makes up her own mind about what she wants to do, and she usually does it."

"Yeh, well, pretty girl like that, all the money in the world—or will have when Czar kicks off—she'd be a fool to stay here in this icehouse the rest of her life. I'd get out myself if I could."

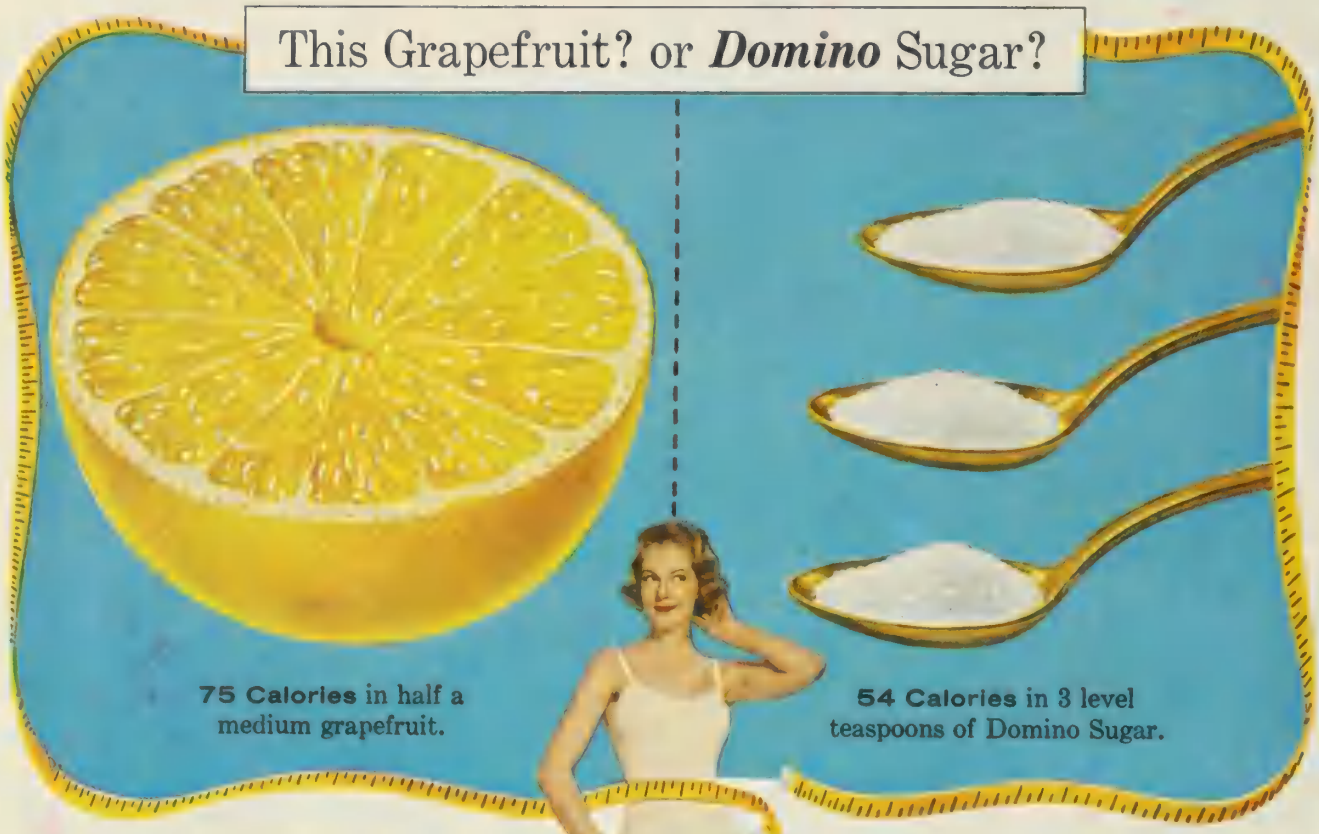
"Why can't you?"

"Well, I don't know, I been thinking about it. Maybe, like they say, the spell of the north has got me, but don't mention it to the old lady. She sure would like to swap it for a spell in California."

From its days of almost utter isolation Baranof—and all Alaska—had retained its love of gossip. It was not so much gossip, perhaps, as interest in all local news, its pioneer curiosity in the small private details of its neighbors' lives.

"Drove past your place the other day, Thor. See you're making some improvements in your cabin. You fixing to get married, now Chris is off your hands?"

"Oh, sure, sure. I figure it's about time for a young fellow like me to settle down."



The town was curious about it. Chris had been away well over a year and in all that time she had not once returned to Baranof. At the end of her first year at the University of Washington she had gone to Europe for three months with a guided student group. Baranof was all but smothered by a chromatic snowstorm of post cards depicting cathedrals, châteaux, canals, castles, parks, forests, restaurants, ruins.

"That old shack of yours must be about the oldest house in Baranof. How old is it, anyway?"

"Only about fifty years. Of course Baranof itself isn't much older than that. But in this country—uh—I mean to say, fifty years isn't old for a good sound building."

Which Is Less Fattening?

This Grapefruit? or Domino Sugar?

Only 18 calories per teaspoon in Domino Pure Cane Sugar . . . and they're all quick energy!

Yes! Only 18 calories per teaspoon in Domino Pure Cane Sugar, and they're all quick energy calories . . . energy your body needs every day. And remember, it's a scientific fact that sugar gives you energy faster than any other food. So . . . while you hold down your weight, lift up your energy with Domino Sugar!

NOW! A DOMINO SUGAR CUSTOM-MADE FOR PERFECT "NO-COOK" ICINGS!

Domino Confectioners 10-X Powdered Sugar makes the smoothest icings ever because it's 50% finer than old-style frosting sugars. For goodness sake . . . put ▪ Domino 10-X frosting on every cake you bake! Easy-to-follow recipes on each package.

. . . more women use Domino than any other sugar!

He was deft and clever with his hands and he ent to work on his log cabin, situated there near the water with a pleasant bit of land round it. He left the exterior weather-blacked logs much as they had been, though he eated them with a creosote preservative. He dded a bedroom, a bathroom and a kitchen. le installed a furnace. The little bathroom was led and it shone with stainless metal. The itchen was fitted out with all the modern ppliances.

One small space that had been his sleeping oom and living quarters—little more than a ed, really, at the rear—he kept as it was. His on bed, his chair, the washstand; a little lay-footed iron stove; his guns, his fishing ckle, his cherished specimens, his books ooks books on rough shelves, in boxes. Exept for his battered and dated typewriter the oom was, in fact, exactly as he had occupied half a century ago.

But the main room—that was a different atter altogether. For this he had removed a artition and turned two rooms into one. He craped and sandpapered and rubbed and axed the old blackened interior logs until ey shone with a mellow golden glow, walls nd rafters.

"Taffy," Addie Barnett said, viewing the ich patina of the wood. "Or cream caramels. t looks as if you could eat it with a spoon. What in the world did you put into that waxng formula, Thor? Molasses and melted gold nd a few strands of Chris' hair? It's like—it's lmost apricot, like ——"

"Like Chris," Ross Guildenstern said. He ometimes came in and helped Thor with echanical jobs. He could take apart or put ogether any kind of mechanism.

The highest happiness on earth is in marriage. Every man who is happily married is a successful man even if he has failed in everything else.

WILLIAM LYON PHELPS

Ott Decker, too, got into the way of dropping by. Usually he took off his coat and fell o work. Thor was, in fact, rather embarrassed by the number of Baranof young men who eemed suddenly to take an interest in his handiwork.

"Chris coming back?" they asked casually as they drove home a nail, painted a bedroom wainscot. "You're fixing this up for her, aren't you?"

"No sign of her coming back," Thor replied. "I'm planning to live here myself until somebody else moves in. Live here as I always have, in that one room there at the back. I'll move out altogether if—when—someone else takes over."

"You will! That'll seem funny. Where?"

"There's a one-room cabin down by the water. I bought it a couple of years ago."

Paul Barnett said one evening when the late-summer daylight still lingered in the midnight sky, "Furniture. Addie and I wondered where the furniture was coming from to go with all this Devonshire cream."

"Blue, don't you think?" Addie suggested. "The couch and cushions blue or maybe a pair of chairs. Blue against all this golden wood. Heavenly! And Chris being so blond."

Surprisingly, Paul Barnett disputed this. "She isn't a blonde at all. She's tawny like a leopard, like a lioness."

"Like an apricot," Ross Guildenstern said. He was down on the floor tinkering with an electric outlet. "Blue is too washy for Chris."

"Just a minute, you two boys," Addie laughed. "I'm kind of a tawny type myself, if you can spare me a look, but I don't see anybody battling about whether I'm a lion or a tiger or an apricot."

Thor was installing bookshelves on either side of the fireplace. He spoke now, over his shoulder, quietly. "Christine is in Seattle and likely to stay there. So don't fight about whether she's flora or fauna. I'm the one who's living in this log house."

Czar, learning of the changes, came by to see for himself. He passed, staring; turned and came by again. The seaman's keen blue eyes had seen him. Thor came to the door.

"Come in, old pardner, come in!"

"I hear you're fixing to be married," Czar called.

Chattily, Thor leaned against the doorjamb. "That's interesting. Anyone we know?"

"Might be." With apparent reluctance he walked leisurely up the path, surveying the house with the remote and casual glance of a stranger. "Could be. Bridie, say. She always was stuck on you."

"I thought it was you. Come in, come in."

"Must be fixing it up for some woman. Look at it! Who're you fooling? Not me. I'm smarter than you are, always was. You're fixing this place up for somebody besides yourself."

Thor went on with his polishing, methodically, lightly. "To tell you the truth, Czar, I may do some traveling, later. Outside. Outside the territory. I've been here a long time, it's time I went away. I could rent this place at a good profit now."

"Uh-huh. You going to pay a visit to those royal relatives you spun that tale about? Up there in Norway. Valhalla, you used to call it. Valhalla. Old Thor, the god from Valhalla."

"I might at that. Valhalla. That's just about the idea, Czar. You've just about hit it."

The fine gray eyes were almost white, the color drained from the cheeks. "Listen to me, old crackpot!" Czar Kennedy told him. "You're fixing up this place for Christine. You think she'll come back here to live. Well, stop kidding yourself. She's marrying Bay Husack and she may come back to Alaska, for a spell, but she'll be the wife of the governor of Alaska. And then the senator from the state of Washington. And then the First Lady of the land. The wife of the President of the United States maybe twenty years from now. So you can stop rubbing that old kindling wood and making out like you're fixing up this shack for rental."

Starlac

the HEART OF MILK, is the heart of good healthful eating

For drinking...cooking...baking...whipping!

Heart-of-milk whipped topping

So simple...so light...so GOOD...

Beat ½ cup dry STARLAC, ½ cup cold water, 1 tablespoon lemon juice, 1 teaspoon vanilla in a deep bowl until mixture is stiff, about 8 minutes. Gradually add 3 tablespoons sugar, continue beating 1 minute or until blended. Chill before serving. Makes about 3½ cups of light, velvety and thrifty topping.

Delicious on most any dessert—for instance, this strawberry-festival pie. Make up a graham cracker crust; fill with vanilla pudding (the packaged kind) made with Starlac; pretty up with sugared strawberries. GOOD!

Light as a summer cloud, dress-up topping you whip up with Starlac, the wonderful nonfat dry milk.

Borden's takes fresh pasteurized milk. Removes the water and fat. Saves the best part—all the B vitamins, proteins, calcium, other minerals. The heart of milk... Starlac®.

Use Starlac for all made-with-milk recipes. Dissolves instantly, even in ice water. Drink it, too. Tastes like what it is—delicious heart of milk.

ABOUT 8¢ A QUART in the 12-qt. family-size package ©Borden Co.

Thor went on rubbing the wood lightly, gazing critically at the glow of the spot on which he was working as though to compare it in rich color and sheen to the section next it.

He straightened his big frame, he glanced meditatively out the window to the water beyond. "Little Christine in the White House. First Lady. She'd be refreshing, but she wouldn't fall in with the ideas of your crowd. There hasn't been a President's wife since—or before—Eleanor Roosevelt that had the courage to be herself. Franklin's wife showed them there was more to being the President's wife than giving dinners to stuffed shirts. They don't use the gold service much any more there, either, I'm told."

Czar turned to leave. "Gabble on, gabble on. Half the time I don't know what you're talking about and I don't think you do either."

"Could be. Could be, Czar. But it's cheap at the price. Outside I'd have to pay a psychoanalyst fifty dollars an hour to sit and listen to me. I don't pay you a cent. And when I gabble to myself it comes even cheaper. In fact, I gain by it, if the truth were known."

Christine Storm was The Fashion. No matter what she said now, they laughed uproariously, admiringly. "Did you hear Chris Storm's crack?"

Certainly Christine had not meant this to be. In the beginning she had merely been honest. She had had no intention of startling them with her replies, answers to questions. A strange new world. Only a few hours' plane distance from Baranof, this city of Seattle, this city of New York, Paris, London, Rome. But a world lay between. And especially, in the beginning, Seattle.

At a dinner party, or in a college group:

"Baranof? Where's that—Russia?"

At first Chris would wait a moment before replying because she found herself possessed by an emotion rare in her. Anger. Behind her teeth the little silent voice cautioned her to remember what Thor had said: "Just be honest and polite, the way you are here at home. If they ask questions, answer them."

So she waited a moment before answering, her lips slightly parted in the small mirthless smile of social intercourse.

"What language do they speak in Alaska?"

"Do they live in igloos?"

"They eat raw fish and whale blubber—that right?"

"Mostly Eskimos up there, aren't they? Except the Army bases, I mean. How did you happen to live up there, Chris?"

"Born there! Look, Chris was born up there, she says."

It was at that time, the beginning of her Seattle experience, that she had got into the habit of giving them what Bay Husack called the old caribou routine. "I was born in a caribou in a blizzard up in the Wood River country. My grandmother on my father's side was one quarter Eskimo. So my father was one eighth Eskimo. That makes me one sixteenth, if I'm any good at arithmetic—which I'm not. And of course I only eat raw fish and seal oil and muktuk."

She might be wearing, at the time, a strapless white dance dress in which she looked so appetizing that her male interrogator had to caution himself not to take a bite.

"Look, Chris, let's start again. Baranof, you said. If it isn't Russia, where is it?"

"It's a town in the territory of Alaska, and Alaska is part of the United States, though it isn't a state. Not yet. By the way, what language do you speak here in Seattle?"

"English, of course."

"Oh. Well, we speak it better in Alaska, if my ear is correct."

But she had a splendid time, for the most part. Certain things shocked her unpleasantly. Baranof's solid middle class fostered an almost Puritan standard of conduct, perhaps because a society so close-knit must, in self-protection, be decorous. But here the standards of many of the young men and women of her own age startled her. She was genuinely horrified at the mild amusement and even disrespect with which her generation Outside regarded old people.

Bay Husack, for example, who was almost ten years her senior. His attitude toward Louise Husack was that of an adult toward a not very bright little girl. Toward his father and his father's associates he displayed a quizzical contempt. Chris, sensing this, criticized it in the form of a generalization.

"I don't see how we can call ourselves civilized. Civilized countries respect and revere old people. Look at the Chinese and the East Indians."

"Yes, look at them!" Bay gibed. "They're in fine shape. They're so civilized that only a few million die of starvation every year. And I've always heard that the Eskimos take their old people out on the ice and let them sit there until they freeze to death."

Her resentment of this was, Bay thought, out of all proportion.

"Perhaps, years ago, when they needed what food there was to keep the young people alive. The hunters and the workers. Your ancestors, hundreds of years ago, probably hit the old people over the head with a club. Ross Guildenstern's grandmother is treated with the most tender respect."

NEXT MONTH

● The new novel by John P. Marquand is the story of a famous Broadway and Hollywood playwright, of the three beautiful women he married—two of them from the theater—and the off-stage drama which they lived. The author of "Sincerely, Willis Wayde," "Point of No Return" and "The Late George Apley" has created another compelling, highly entertaining novel of contemporary America.

WOMEN AND THOMAS HARROW

By JOHN P. MARQUAND

begins in the JULY JOURNAL

"Ross what!"

"It doesn't matter. In Alaska the old pioneers are respected. They're considered valuable citizens."

"You're like Queen Victoria, brought up by a bunch of graybeards. You're out of stir now, you're living alone, doesn't that put ideas into your head?"

"There are about fifty other girls living in my building. Why don't you try coming around and ringing doorbells?"

"It sounds pretty repulsive, but I'll come."

"Do. And bring your fiancée, Miss Drake."

"She isn't my fiancée."

"She told me she was."

"That's odd. I thought you were."

"You talk like Louis the Sixteenth."

"You're going to be an old maid if you're not careful—you and your frozen-north ways. Don't say Uncle Bay didn't warn you."

"Bitter boy, you hate the world."

"Maybe I do."

"But why? It's wonderful!"

"You tell me all about it sometime."

"I can tell you now."

"All right. Let's sit down here, real cozy, and I'll put an arm around you, and you talk and I'll listen."

She had been asked to dinner at the Husacks'. Louise Husack said, "You're like one of the family, Christine dear. We all love having you—Bay and all of us."

Not Miss Dina Drake, Chris thought. Any dinner now I expect to find arsenic in my soup.

Suddenly now, as she sat with Bay in the dim handsome library, so rich in shelves and shelves of lovely leather whose contents no one read, she felt relaxed and at ease with this rather frightening young man. His arm was about her shoulder, her hand was in his. It was surprising.

"For the first time in all these months I feel comfortable and cozy with you, Bay."

"Women always have to talk about their emotions. All right. You feel that way because you think you're going to say something that will help me. Women love that. Gives them a warm glow."

"You're an upset person. You came home from the war upset. And you don't like your father. Lots of people don't like their fathers. And you're bored with his business. If you cared more about people—I mean if you knew what's going on. Here in Seattle you're all so old-fashioned!"

"That's a refreshing one. I'll have to tell that to pop."

"Please do. He's the most old-fashioned of all. It's the middle of the twentieth century—past the middle—and they're still behaving as if it were the nineteenth. Robber barons! It couldn't be more old-fashioned."

"Like your grandpappy Czar Kennedy—who's paying your bills here at Washington, I understand."

"Yes. Like him too. But at least Grampa Czar lives in Alaska and loves it and does things for it."

"Such as what?"

"Newspapers. And banks. And shops. And coal. At least he isn't an absentee millionaire. The first Alaska absentee millionaire was Peter the Great—and then Catherine. There've been lots of absentee millionaire landlords since then, and your father is one of them."

"Yet you come here to dinner!" His tone was mock horror.

"I know. Aunt Louise has been so good and kind."

"Are you sure it isn't me? I'm not good and kind, but I'm interesting."

The honest merry eyes regarded him searchingly. "I've thought of that. You're a kind of challenge. Like converting a drunkard."

"Better be careful. You might get seriously involved in the process. You know—like the woman who tries to cure him by taking a drink every time he does. Next thing she's right down there in the gutter with him."

"I'm stronger than you are."

"Sugar, you'll never get a husband if you talk like that."

"I'm not worried."

"Are you bespoke, ma'am?"

"Not at present, sir."

"You might be any minute now if you'll forget that high-school-psychology chatter. Don't try to make a noble character out of me. I think the world stinks. I'm a rich man's son and I enjoy it in my own way. But no responsibility, thank you. Like a clerk in the shipping department—I only work here."

The library door opened; Louise Husack came in. The two sat facing her, Bay's arm about Christine, Christine's golden head so close to his. They did not move. They did not appear embarrassed because they weren't.

"Hi, Aunt Louise! I'm leading your son astray."

All the wattles and lines in Mrs. Husack's face seemed to melt into one radiant smile. "That's nice." She cast about the room a cursory glance that would not have discovered a packing case. "I thought I'd left my glasses—but no." She stepped hastily back into the outer hall, she closed the double doors gently.

"Mom's up to something," Bay observed.

Dreamily, as though thinking aloud, she said, "I suppose it's too easy here. Everything that's difficult in Baranof is easy here. Keeping warm. Food. A place to live. Getting from place to place. You can't imagine how wonderful it seems to me to be able to get into a car and just drive. Drive anywhere!"

"What's so wonderful about that?"

"There are no roads in Alaska—at least, none to speak of, considering how big it is. From town to town, I mean. Of course we have the planes. That's wonderful."

"Now listen, honey, you're really a little queer about all this, aren't you? A nice, attractive girl, but a little tetched in the head."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 84

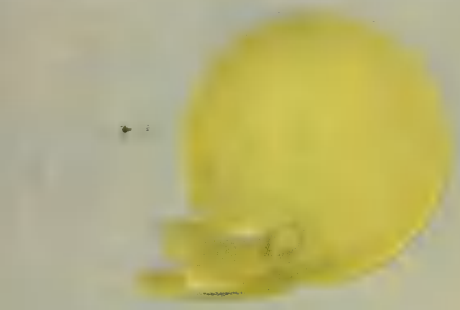
ENJOY WONDROUS BEAUTY...

Forget Breakage

BOONTON PATRICIAN DINNERWARE

Now Boontonware brings all of its near-miracle qualities to four exquisite patterns. Patrician, too, is made with the special care and an extra measure of remarkable Melamine that has made Boonton's quality unsurpassed. Little wonder it has the luxury look and feel and strength that takes as safely to youngsters and the dishwasher as all Boontonware. These qualities are now yours in four elegant patterns. Special prices, too, for a limited time. Look for "Boontonware" on the back of every piece, at department and better hardware stores.

Save 30% — Special Introductory Offer



PATTERN PLACE SETTING 3.98
(extra-large dinner plate, cup, saucer)
$5.60 open stock value

Solid Color Place Setting 2.98
$4.25 open stock value

Boontonware®
Finest of all Melamine Dinnerware

Four patterns: Meadow Spray (shown), Scandia, Golden Poinsettia, Leaves— or choose from four solid colors: Butter Yellow (shown); Bon Bon Pink; Shell White; Turquoisette. Designed by Belle Kogan.

Written Guarantee Against Breakage with Every Purchase

Extra-large 10½" dinner plate

Boontonware is molded to unsurpassed quality with an extra measure of Melamine. This hidden strength guards against breakage year after year.

Man most likely to succeed
. . . in getting over a stomach ulcer

"Yes," said the doctor, "you have a stomach ulcer. If you want to get over it, you must slow down and quit worrying."

"Sounds easy, but how do I do it?" the patient asked.

"You've got to work at it. You can't change your ways overnight. Don't bottle up your worries. Talk them over with someone you trust.

"When problems seem insurmountable, leave them awhile—spend a few hours with a book or putter around your garden.

"In any case, tackle your big problems one at a time and your work load will seem lighter. Let some things wait until tomorrow.

"After some rest and a good night's sleep, the chances are you will view your troubles next day more calmly and clearly."

And so this man . . . convinced that tension and other strains are his worst enemies . . . is on the way to getting over his ulcers.

It is estimated that about one-half million Americans have ulcers. Moreover, ulcers take the lives of nearly 10,000 Americans every year.

Many factors are thought to contribute to ulcers—too much heavy, rich, spicy food, irregular meals and sleep. But emotional stress seems to be the chief culprit.

When an ulcer is discovered early and treated promptly, however, most patients can relieve their symptoms by diet, acid-neutralizing medicines, and emotional discipline.

Although relief of symptoms is usually easy to achieve, ulcers sometimes tend to recur and patients who have had an ulcer should have periodic medical supervision.

If unchecked, an ulcer may undermine general health by upsetting digestive processes . . . or it may penetrate the wall of the affected organ and require immediate surgery.

Fortunately, operations for these complications are successful in most of the cases.

Should an ulcer occur, recovery depends largely on the patient himself. If he follows his doctor's advice about diet, medication and a normal daily routine, he stands an excellent chance of overcoming his ulcer and living out his normal life in good health.

COPYRIGHT 1958—METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company

(A MUTUAL COMPANY)

1 MADISON AVE., NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.
1 Madison Ave., N. Y. 10, N. Y.

Please mail me a free copy of your booklet, "Emotions and Physical Health," 6-58-J.

Name_____

Street_____

City_____ State_____

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 82

"I know it sounds foolish to you. But we can't get a word of publicity, we really can't. There's so much money—so much Outside money spent to keep everything very, very quiet. My Grampa Thor described it to me and I'll never forget it. He said the thing the big boys want is no publicity. Every other person and every other organization and every other business setup in the whole country seems to be yelling for publicity, but grampa said that's exactly what these men don't want. So every Alaska bill and every Alaska measure and every Alaska voice is killed killed killed. You've never seen a bear fishing? They sit hours and hours, so quiet they don't seem to be breathing, watching the water, watching the water. Then, so quick your eye can hardly see it, one big paw goes in up to here—snatch—and up the paw comes with a big fine salmon. Quiet. Quiet. That's the boys Outside, Grampa Thor said."

"He must be quite a boy himself."

"I wish you could see Alaska. Though you'd probably hate it. Lots of people do—even people who've lived there a long time."

"But not you, h'm?"

"You're laughing at me, but I don't care. It's heavenly and luxurious here, and it's rough and pretty uncomfortable there sometimes. But everything is still to be done there and maybe that's why I like it better. That's what makes it exciting."

"No more travel talks, please. And all that wise old philosophy you've been brought up on."

"Go on—sneer! But I wish you could meet them."

"Meet who? Oh, your—the one you call Grampa Thor, and that old nurse of yours?" Bay asked.

"Yes. And Paul and Addie Barnett, and George Sundborg—he's an editor in Juneau—and the Atwoods in Anchorage and Herb Hilscher and that incredible Eva McGown in Fairbanks, and the Nordales, and Bob Bartlett, our delegate, he's just the most wonderful—and Ernest Gruening—he was our governor, you know—no, you don't know, I suppose—they live in Washington anyway, those two—I mean Washington, D.C., not your Washington—I wish you could—I love them ——" She stopped with a jerk as she looked, wide-eyed, at the dry cynical eyes regarding her.

He was staring at her with the look of a man who loathes the first sign of hysteria. And then she was weeping. "I'm sorry. How

OTHER VIEWS, SIZES AND PRICES OF VOGUE PATTERNS ON PAGES 64 & 65

Vogue Design No. 2824.	One-piece dress and panty; 2–6 (21–24). 50c.
Vogue Design No. 2831.	One-piece dress and petticoat; 2–6 (21–24). 50c.
Vogue Design No. 2834.	"Easy to Make" sunbonnet, apron and panty; 2–6 (21–24). 50c.
Vogue Design No. 2829.	One-piece dress and panty; 2–6 (21–24). 60c.
Vogue Design No. 2833.	One-piece dress and apron; 2–6 (21–24). 50c.
Vogue Pattern No. 2835.	Shirt and boxer shorts; 2–6 (21–24). 50c.
Vogue Design No. 2832.	One-piece dress and bolero; 2–6 (21–24). 50c.
Vogue Design No. 9453.*	One-piece dress and tie; 10–18 (31–38). 75c.
Vogue Design No. 9205.	One-piece dress; 10–18 (31–38). 75c.
Vogue Design No. 9517.	One-piece dress; 10–18 (31–38). 75c.

*We have buttoned the tab above the waistline in back rather than low on the skirt.

diotic. I guess I'm homesick—at my age! And I was going to keep a stiff upper lip."

"No, don't. A stiff upper lip never gets kissed." His other arm came round her. He kissed her wet cheek as one would kiss a weeping child, tenderly, to comfort her.

With an unerring sense of the dramatic, Dina Drake came into the dim quiet room. She did not apologize.

"Bay, you bad boy, what are you doing to that poor kid?"

"Kissing her," Bay said. "Very nice too."

"No wonder Aunt Louise sent me in here on some fool errand about her glasses. I suppose she thought it was time somebody interrupted this little snuggle."

She pretended to be searching for the mythical glasses, ignoring Christine as though she were a child.

Chris lifted her head, extracted a handkerchief from Bay's pocket, wiped her eyes with it, blew her nose, and stared at Dina Drake.

"Oh, go away, Dina," she said. "I'm not trying to steal your gent. But I could if I put my mind to it."

"Isn't that darling, Bay? If she put her mind to it. I love the way you Alaskans talk."

"Yes-s-s!" And now she was being very Oxford English, unconsciously, as Thor Storm was when he was very angry. "So quaint. So different from you Kansas City girls."

"Not worthy of you, dear," Dina said. "I guess Aunt Louise was just worried, that's all. She knows that Bay sometimes —— I don't mind because I'm used to it. I let him smooch around with other girls if he wants to. I don't have to be jealous but I think he ought to pick people his own size who can protect themselves."

Bay stood up, he shook himself a little, a kind of shrug into his coat collar. "This is getting sort of sordid. Listen, Chris. Mom tricked her into coming down here—good old dumb mom—so she'd see that I've fallen for somebody—a little stumble of a fall, anyway—if I ever could fall for anyone. Which I doubt. Well, you gals clobber it out between you. But watch out, Chris, she won't fight fair."

The two women stood facing each other only for a moment. Dina Drake's tone was friendly, almost casual. "I think you ought to know that Bay and I are going to be married. It was arranged long before you came," she told Chris.

"I think you ought to tell him, then. He denies it!"

The resourceful Dina tried another tack. "It's easy enough for you. You've had those rich people all your life in Alaska, and now here, cuddling you up, and handing you around. I haven't got anybody. Leave him alone, won't you!"

"That's what Bay meant when he said no holds barred. You don't fight fair. Listen. I'm going to finish my time here and get my degree and then I'm going back. And I think it's sickening to see two grown women snarling over a man like two Huskies over a chunk of muktuk."

"Huskies—mu——"

"Never mind." She turned at the door. "Don't forget Aunt Louise's glasses. She had them up on the top of her head when she came in."

She had seen various Alaskans occasionally as they flew to or through Seattle. Czar had flown in twice, Bridie once, Thor never. She had seen Ross twice when he had managed to wangle the flights. She had Louise Husack and Bridie to lunch. She was delighted to see that the two women got on marvelously together, dissimilar though they were.

"Do you notice any change in our Christine?" Mrs. Husack's question was accompanied by a possessive glance.

"She looks a little thinner to me. Maybe she isn't getting her sleep, studying the way she does. Chris, you getting enough sleep?"

"Loads."

"Or maybe," Mrs. Husack simpered, "she's in love."

"I am," Chris said. Bridie jumped noticeably. "I'm in love with Seattle and Alaska and life and the world." Bridie relaxed.

"I want to invite you to my home, Mrs. Ballantyne," Louise Husack said. "We've loved it all these years—anyway, Mr. Husack has, he's a man loves his home—and I'd like you to see it while I'm still there."

"Aunt Louise!"

"My goodness, where you going?" Bridie demanded.

"Oh, I don't mean what you mean. The truth is, I'd like to travel if I can only get Mr. Husack to see it the way I do. I want to see Paris and Italy and all those places. Greece, even, and Egypt. We've been right on the edge of starting a dozen times, but then something always comes up. But now I told him we're going. Let Bayard and Christine take over the house."

"Aunt Louise, what in the world are you talking about?"

"You know perfectly well Bay's crazy about you."

"He isn't crazy about anybody."

"That's just his way. You don't know him the way I do."

Bridie had heard enough. "Now just a minute. Is this some kind of royal marriage or something that's being fixed up between you Husacks and Czar?"

Chris laughed. "No, Bridie darling. You're just sick of housekeeping, aren't you, Aunt Louise?"

"I am. I'm good and sick of whether we should have leg of lamb or chicken or a four-rib roast. I didn't mind when I was younger. But I've been keeping house for almost forty years and I'm good and sick and tired of it, and that's the truth. I'll be glad to move out of that big place into one of the new little eight-room apartments. The girl that marries Bay won't need a thing. Not a thing. There's linen and silver and china and glass enough to set for a hundred. We have set for a hundred, many's the time. You and Chris come to dinner tomorrow and I'll show it all to you."

Bridie jerked her hat which she had worn throughout lunch. She straightened herself in her chair, she sniffed. "I live in one room in the Ice Palace. From choice. I'd think two rooms a burden. I've got six dinner plates, six cups and saucers, six glasses, six salads, six soups, six knives and forks—and so on—and two luncheon sets I got that time I was in Hawaii. They're as good as the day I ——"

Crisply Christine cut in: "Can't come to dinner tomorrow night, thanks, Aunt Louise. I'm going to the sorority dance. It's the big dance of the year."

"With Bay?"

"I did ask him. Just to hear what he'd say. He said he didn't go to children's parties. Ross Guildenstern's going to be here." Now Bridie looked up sharply. "I've invited him. I haven't seen him in months and months and months."

"I'd think," Bridie suggested, "there'd be plenty of nice boys right here in Seattle, wouldn't have to be imported."

Ross Guildenstern telephoned from the airport five minutes after his plane had landed. "Chris!"

"Ross! I don't know why I even speak to you. I haven't heard for months. That's why I started running after you."

"See, the guy was right, absence does make them come whimpering."

"Eight o'clock and some of the kids are meeting here first, so come early."

"I had my tux pressed ——"

"Don't call it tux."

"Dinner clothes, Seattle. Dinner clothes. Anyway, it makes no difference because I tried it on. I haven't worn it in four years and I'd be arrested. Inches too small."

"Rent one. You have to wear dinner clothes. It's the one very important party ——"

"I won't disgrace you. I hope. I'll rent one with stripes down the side of the pants and everything."

The rented suit looked frightful on him, though Chris did not say so. He was too muscular, too square-shouldered to look his best in evening clothes—rented evening clothes. But he turned out to be a hit. The young men and women, clustered around him, seemed to find in this olive-skinned, smiling young man a certain frankness and freshness that had attracted them to Christine.

"Where do you live, Mr.—uh—Guild—no! Not really Guildenstern!"

"I live in Baranof—that is, when I'm on the ground. . . . No, I was born in an Eskimo village called Oogruk, it's on the Bering Strait. Now it's quite a town. . . . No, we don't live in igloos. In Baranof I live at the Ice Palace, most of the pilots——It's an apartment hotel. . . . No, Alaska isn't what you think, you ought to come to Alaska sometime."

At the end of the evening, "You going to stay here, Chris?"

"I'm going to finish, of course."

"I mean stay."

"I don't know what I'm going to do."

"In Baranof they say you're going to marry him."

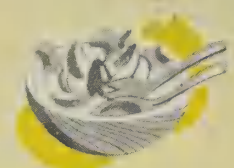
"Ross, I don't know what I'm going to do. I feel so mixed up."

"Fly back with me tomorrow. You don't need a college degree."

"You have one."

"I wasn't mixed up."

"I'm going to Washington next week. Washington, D.C., I mean."



"Alone?"

"Oh, no! With Uncle Dave and Aunt Louise, and Bay, and Dina Drake's going too—she's his secretary; Uncle Dave's, I mean—the Alaska bill is supposed to come up. It's so exciting—a lot of Alaska people will be there. Maybe this time Alaska will make it. Oh, Ross, wouldn't it be wonderful!"

CONTINUED ON PAGE 87

Real lemonade . . . real easy . . . real good . . . with REALEMON! We squeeze . . . you pour!

REALEMON* reconstituted Lemon Juice makes thirst-quenching lemonade in seconds—a glass or a pitcherful. So simple to make . . . just pour REALEMON from the bottle, add cold water, sweeten to taste. Buy REALEMON Lemon Juice today, enjoy frosty lemonade all summer long. Easy, speedy, delicious. Weight watchers . . . you sweeten it exactly the way you want it. Get a big bottle of REALEMON Lemon Juice today!

REALEMON in Salads: Make cooling salads and dressings with tangy REALEMON . . . fewer calories, too!

REALEMON in Desserts: So easy to make pies, cakes, custards with REALEMON—just pour your lemon juice!

New "Plastic" Lemons: Natural strength juice in ready-to-use plastic squeeze "lemons" and "limes", they sit flat.

we squeeze ...you pour!

*REALEMON is natural strength lemon juice, not a concentrate. "RECONSTITUTED" is your guarantee of uniform strength—uniform flavor in every drop.

A product and Reg. T.M. of REALEMON - PURITAN CO., Chicago 9, Ill., San Fernando, Cal.

Got a weighty problem?

ENJOYABANANA!

Calorie low!* Vitality high! Bananas belong in your daily diet!

Weight-losing diets
A medium banana has only 88 calories—and sweet, mellow bananas are so satisfying!

Infant diets
Bananas are so easy to digest doctors prescribe them as one of baby's first solid foods!

Growing-up diets
Bananas provide vitamins and minerals, plus wholesome fruit sugars for energy.

Geriatric diets
Easy to fix, easy to chew, easy to digest, bananas are perfect for older folks.

Vitality diets
Bananas are a wonderful-tasting way to get nutrition essentials you need for health!

Only 88 calories in a medium banana! Sweet and satisfying bananas are for you, if you want to control your weight painlessly. Want a snack that fills you up without filling you out? Havabanana. Want to satisfy your sweet tooth without spoiling your figure? Eatabanana. That rich, mellow flavor makes it easier to stick to your diet. And bananas provide a well-rounded supply of important vitamins and minerals to help keep your vitality high while your weight goes down.

UNITED FRUIT COMPANY

Help yourself—HAVABANANA!

Help yourself to a slender figure!
Help yourself to better digestion!
Help yourself to new vitality!

REMEMBER—a medium banana has only 88 calories.

* Calorie low—Only 88 calories in a medium banana, according to the U.S. Dept. of Agriculture. Fruits as a class are low in calories, and bananas are a particularly low-calorie food because they are usually eaten straight from the peel with no high-calorie extras added.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 85

hey flew across a continent. Christine was ustomed to flying, certainly, yet now she as elated as though she never had flown ore. Mountains, rivers, plains, prairies, ests. It was a miraculously clear day; over whole land there hung a dreamlike opales- t light.

Their hotel was jammed. Dave Husack med to know everyone from the doorman he hearty, bellowing men who thronged the by. Christine was introduced to many men the hotel, in the Senate lunchroom, in the ls of Congress.

The men Dave knew seemed to be divided o three kinds. There were the big, bellowing d like Dave Husack himself; usually they re middle-aged or older. They greeted one other with affectionate abuse and name ling.

Then there were the quiet crafty secret ones. ke Sid Kleet, she thought. He was there . These talked in a low voice, their eyes re turned to the corner with a listening look. eir faces were like those Christine had seen the portraits on the walls of Italian galleries, picting thirteenth-century Florentine politi- l plotters. The look, the gestures, the planes the crafty faces were the same.

The third sort was made up of younger men. ey looked a good deal like Bay Husack, sillusioned, Christine decided, and striking t not as handsome as Bay. They smiled wn at you in an appreciative sort of way. ey were so young to be so well known and tionally successful. Yet as they talked with r, if she happened to look up at them sud- nly, instinctively sensing a loss of attention, e found that though their heads were still nt admiringly toward her, and they were ying, "Yup. Yup. Oh, now you're kidding e, Miss Storm," their eyes had an anxious, rained look and they were listening not to r but to two men who were conversing a w feet away.

In the three days of their stay in the capital hris tried not to complain about the heat d the breathlessness. "I find myself trying t to breathe," she said to Bay. "I feel exactly if I were walking underwater."

"That's practically what you're doing, con- dering the humidity in this town. And you're way over your head in a lot of other ways o—I hope."

She had showered Baranof with post cards the White House, the Capitol, Washington onument, the Lincoln Memorial. But to hor and to Czar and Bridie and the Barnetts e sent telegrams:

LASKA BILL COMING UP SEVENTEENTH HARDLY AIT WILL TELEGRAPH YOU RESULT LOVE CHRISTINE

hey sat in the first row of the Visitors' allery—she and Bay and Dina and Louise nd Dave. To the others the imposing room, e men seated like outsize schoolboys at esks, was not a novel sight, but to Christine it as breath-taking, it was dramatic, it was his- ry. She sat leaning well forward. Her eyes ere shining, enormous.

"When are they going to bring it up, Uncle ave?"

"Any minute now."

Bay said, "Don't expect too much. You're ere to see Washington, not for Alaska olitics. Take it easy." He turned to his father nd said something, low-voiced, as though in emonstrance: "—— a dirty trick." At least, it ounded like that.

Dave Husack leaned well toward her then, e spoke with earnestness. "It was your rampa Czar Kennedy suggested this visit to Washington, you know, Chris. For you, I nean. I guess he thought you might learn from eeing things in the—in the making, politically peaking."

Chris' face was sparkling, radiant. "I'm so lad he did."

But now there was a sound of scuffling and tartled voices from the dignified chamber of government below. The men at the desks and he man on the raised platform stared, startled. Chris, leaning forward, saw suddenly the giant figure of Thor Storm striding down the aisle while other men clung to him, impeding his progress. One great arm was upraised like that of a prophet of the Bible. He spoke in a voice of thunder, but then the clinging men succeeded in confining and twisting his arms, and they turned him around like a bundle and rushed him up the aisle. They disappeared with him. In the midst of the melee a man rose in the House and said something above the uproar as though he had been waiting for this moment. You just caught the word "Alaska." There was a mumble. The man sat down. That was all.

Chris scrambled wildly out of her seat. "Grampa Thor! Grampa Thor!"

"Sh-h-h! Sit down!"

"That was my Grampa Thor! I'm going down to him. I'm—what are they doing to him?"

Dave Husack yanked her into the seat. "He's all right. Sit still. I've tended to that. They'll let him go. That settles Alaska for two more years, anyway. That's all."

"You knew about this! You—Grampa Czar—that's why ——"

"Come back here, and keep out of it. He's all right, I tell you. The delegation's with him. After lunch you can ——"

Chris pressed both hands flat to her stomach as though she were about to be sick. "All!" she cried, her voice so high and clear that the gallery turned to stare at her even as they began to move out and up through the exits. "All! No! No!" She fought her way forward, she leaned far over the balcony.

"Listen to him! Listen to him! That's my grandfather, Thor Storm! You men! Listen! Alaska must be free! Alaska! Alaska!" Like the old-day suffragettes, like Charlotte Corday, like Joan.

She was, of course, hysterical.

Dave Husack gathered her up with one great paw and pulled her down into the seat. She felt his moist soft palm clapped across her mouth, stifling her. She managed to work her lips back somewhat from beneath the pressure and bit the hand hard so that she was gratified to hear his howl of pain and rage. Then he slapped her.

There were sixteen for dinner. Christine had planned for ten only. At the last minute she had had to serve buffet fashion a dinner which had not been designed for this informality. Even the after-dinner conversation around the fire, usually so stimulating at territory dinner parties, turned out to be rambling, aimless, what with the entire company's efforts to work over Bayard Husack, who, according to mukluk grapevine rumor, was slated to be the next governor of Alaska.

"There'll be ten for dinner," Chris had said. "Not counting Grampa Thor, he's just coming in for a minute after dinner."

"He'll come in for a minute and speechify all night. What's got into him? The way he behaved this noon with the General there and all those Seattle big bugs. They've always said we're nothing but wild Indians here in Alaska. They'll use it against us. The way they did that Washington fracas."

"Bridie, I'm worried about him. He does all those spectacular things. And he looks so thin, so almost wasted. Today when I took hold of his arm—it's always been like a column of iron—there just wasn't anything there."

"It's his living alone in that little shack. Men don't eat right when they live alone."

"He's lived like that most of his life."

"He's just getting older. Aren't we all! I've just begun to realize it myself. What're you having for dinner? Here it is, middle of the afternoon, how are you going to scrabble food together for a crowd?"

"Addie's coming in to help, and the Toklat girl is going to serve and wash dishes."

"I'll pitch in. I'll dress early and get over here. What time did you say?"

"Eight. Bay and Dina are used to late dinners. Anyway, I can't help it."

"What you having?"

"An all-Alaska menu."

"They'll hate it."

"Not this. Alaska smoked salmon first with the drinks. Then a caribou broil, parsley and butter sauce ——"

"Tough."

"The steaks are marinating now in oil and vinegar. Potatoes, Harvard beets, rhubarb-and-cranberry relish, salad, ice cream with frozen strawberries. Every bite of it grown right here in Alaska. Coffee around the fire."

"Home-grown, too, I suppose."

"Now, Bridie, don't be cranky."

"All that to do between now and eight! Why you want to run yourself ragged cooking for those two I can't see."

"Bay's my friend—or was. And his mother was so good to me—she still writes me to come and visit, as though nothing had happened, poor dear."

"I suppose that Drake's a poor dear too."

"If he's going to marry her at last, why, good for bad old Dina."

"From what I hear, she's earned it. My opinion, she never cared a hoot about him. Old Dave, now, he's more her cup of tea, old as he is. It's a wonder she didn't slip something into Louise Husack's food long ago. Maybe she did, maybe that's why Louise's been so ailing."

"You've been seeing too many TV shows, Bridie."

"Where're the men eating—Dave Husack and that Distelhorst and Kleet and those?"

"Grampa Czar's having them at home, I'm having my guests at home. It's a chance to tell Bay the facts of life—Alaska life, I mean."

"If they're flying up to Nome and Oogruk tomorrow, like they've planned, and maybe going to Kotzebue and Barrow, they'll learn

FROZEN ASSETS

By GEORGIE STARBUCK GALBRAITH

Though I smolder with secret passions,
I'm never the least indiscreet.
For whenever I feel hotheaded,
I always develop cold feet!

the facts of Alaska life, all right. Who's mustered as Public Relations escort?"

"I was. I'm not going."

"Well, I should hope not! Christine Storm, I bet you could marry Bay Husack today, if you wanted to. And what a governor's wife you'd be! Maybe he's changed, maybe he's just going to show old Dave he can't ——"

"I was sort of planning to be governor of Alaska myself, twenty years from now. They don't call them 'governess,' do they? . . . I think I'll have the potatoes baked, though it's a lot of work. I mean baked and stuffed, mashed up with butter and milk and stuffed back to brown in the oven, they look so dressy and delicious."

"Who you punishing?"

Christine always found it amusing to see the expression in the faces of guests entering her house for the first time. The gleaming golden walls and beams looked down upon a soft golden carpet. A great curved cushioned couch could seat ten before the fire. The chairs embraced without engulfing you. Lamps shone upon the soft green of Alaska jade and mellow ivory carvings. A polar-bearskin rug. Paintings of Alaskan scenes by Lawrence, etchings by the Eskimo Ahgupuk, lithographs by the Alaskan Machetanz. Books books books. There were no Indian masks or woven baskets.

"Why, Chris!" they always exclaimed. "But this is lovely!"

Dina, entering the room (wool dinner dress, deep crimson), said the expected. "Chris! But this is lovely!"

Bay stood a moment in the doorway. He looked about the soft golden room. "Whoever did this must have loved you."

"He still does, I hope. Grampa Thor Storm. He did it while I was at school in Seattle. Here it was when I came back. Waiting for me. Grampa Czar wouldn't speak to me. . . . You've met Mrs. Ballantyne. . . . Mr. and Mrs. Paul Barnett, they publish the Northern Light—with Grampa Thor, of course. . . . Ross Guildenstern you've met too. Oh, of course, you met them all at the airport. . . . Mrs. Gannon, Judge Gannon. . . . Ott Decker of course. . . . Professor Derwent, of our Baranof College. . . . Mrs. Cale Korf and Cale Korf, Arctic Circle Airlines chief; you're going up in one of his planes tomorrow."

Bridie, determined to get things off to a good start, said, "That's a handsome red, Miss Drake. It's seldom you see a real true crimson; it's the French dye does it."

Dina glanced about her. "I hope the things I've brought aren't too formal. I thought with Bay so much in the public eye ——"

Bridie threw her good intentions to the winds. "Oh, they expect Dave Husack's secretary to be a snappy dresser. Anyway, you can't be too dressy for Alaskans. We dress for dinner on the planes."

Dinner was not a success. Caribou steaks and baked potatoes are not fare to be eaten buffet style. Bridie's prediction about the caribou had turned out to be true. Ott Decker spilled red wine on the golden carpet and for a moment the tears came to his eyes, or seemed to as Chris tried to reassure him. He said, "It had to be me. It couldn't be Husack or even Ross. It had to be me. Mother's helper."

"Salt," Chris ordered cheerfully. "We'll pour a lot of salt on it, it makes red-wine spots vanish. Don't ask me why. Think no more of it, Ott dear." He wished she wouldn't call him Ott dear. She didn't call Ross or that Husack Ross dear, Bay dear. In public, anyway.

An evening of talk, Chris thought wildly, was what I'd planned. Talk about what? Bay had sat next her, a plate teetered precariously on a small side table.

"When are you planning to be married, Bay?" She had not meant to ask this. There it was.

"Whenever you say."

"Same old Bay, never a dull moment."

"Don't play dumb. You know about this charade."

"No. No, I don't."

"I don't know what I see in you, you're just a Girl Scout. Wouldn't it be a joke on me—and some others—if I really did end up just another White House captive, all because it might soften you up!"

"You can't want to be governor. Anyway, it's too ridiculous, even for the Seattle crowd."

Dinner was finished, they were concentrating on him.

"Mr. Husack ——"

"Mr. Husack ——"

"Mr. Husack ——"

"Call me Bay."

Chris knew that he was grinning inside at his own imitation of the homey politician he despised.

The sound of heavy footsteps in the entrance, a door closed gently. Chris thought without being aware of her own thinking, He walks more heavily than he used to, though he weighs less. Thor came in. A little greeting gesture of the hand and the head, quiet, almost self-effacing. No matter what he wore, he always, somehow, appeared neater and cleaner than most men, perhaps merely because of the fine pink skin. You could see the path of the careful comb through the once-golden hair, silver now. He was wearing a prim blue-and-white polka-dot bow tie. The boyishness of this sent a sudden pang through Christine's heart.

"Grampa Thor, you know everyone here."

Thor seated himself near the group, but not quite of it. He dwarfed any chair he might sit in. There never was sufficient room for the long legs.

"I had some of that caribou steak myself for my supper," he said. "I wish to apologize to the guests, in the name of Alaska. Tough as a blacksmith's apron."

They laughed a little then at his frankness and at the almost archaic figure of speech; the laugh united the company for the first time. His head cocked a little to one side, he sat listening to the talk. His calm, appraising gaze went from this face to that. He listened without speaking. "Hydrogen . . . old stuff now. . . . Russia. . . . Shabby genteel old England. . . . That so! The most courageous people in the world. . . . Hungary. . . . Poland. . . . Czechoslovakia. . . . Israel. . . . Egypt. . . . Dew Line . . . obsolete a week after they're born all of them . . . well, say, maybe that's what we ought to do . . . we are already, aren't we! But not enough of us. . . . You going to be a stooge governor, Mr. Husack?"

There was a little shocked silence. In that silence Thor Storm began to speak in that low, vibrant voice which Christine had so fortunately inherited from him.

"It will soon be finished unless a miracle happens. I believe in miracles. We have reached a depth of degradation such as the world has never known. Millions and billions of people are working like dumb slaves to pay for weapons which will destroy them. Every nation is armed against every other nation. Now the greatest minds in the world, the magnificent brains of the scientists and the minds of inventors and of men of business and of teachers and politicians and writers and rulers and manual workers are concentrated on creating more and more deadly instruments of war. They insist that these are not instruments of war—they are instruments to prevent and forestall war. As well place a box of matches and a stick of dynamite in the hands of a child to keep him quiet. This is childish, this is madness, this isn't proper behavior for man, the highest form of animal life, the one creature endowed with the thing called the spirit." He rose to his feet with effort. "I must be maundering a little. I find I do occasionally now," he said. He walked through the room as though no one was there. Then he continued, "What a lovely world. The loveliest. And now we're throwing it away." He went to the doorway almost blindly. "Alaska, the arsenal. It should be free."

As Christine rose swiftly to go to him there was a heavy knocking at the door. Then the outer door slammed, heavy footsteps in the entrance. Thor had disappeared through the doorway. Now he reappeared, he was strangely alert again and incisive. And at that momen the telephone rang.

"There are a couple of Territorial Police outside. They want to take you back to the Ice Palace right away, Bayard Husack," Thor said.

Uncertain laughter, rather bewildered raillery. "Say, Bay, you're a fast worker! Go here this morning and the cops already ——"

Ross Guildenstern had answered the telephone. He turned. "It's your father, Bay. I sounds very ——"

"What!" He picked up the telephone, he heard, he hung up. "My mother."

"Bay!" Chris cried.

He nodded. One of the Territorial Police stood in the doorway. "Excuse me, sir. We're taking you to the Ice Palace, Mr. Husack. They're trying to connect with a plane and a pilot, but this time of night ——"

"I'll get you to the plane," Cale Korf said. "Come on, let's get going."

Ross Guildenstern came forward. "I'll take it—if you need a pilot."

Half an hour later Bridie, the guests gone, cushions plumped, ash trays emptied, glasses rinsed, was limping her way in too-high heels out to the car in which the faithful Ott Decker had returned to take her home. Her arm rested on Chris'.

"He said," Ott reported, not happily, "that they'll be back this spring, probably April or May. That's what he said. So I guess they mean business."

"That girl's look!" Bridie said, settling herself in the seat beside Ott. "I was looking straight at her when the news came. It was like a candle had been lighted behind her face. Radiant. That's the only word for it. Radiant. Governor's wife me eye!"

Through the open door the sound of the telephone again. Chris ran up the icy path and into the golden room and snatched the receiver.

"Chris!"

"Yes, Bay."

"Wait for me."

All through the spring Thor spent odd moments working on his new boat. It wasn't a powerboat. It was an old-fashioned square-ended skiff such as fishermen in the old Scandinavian countries and fishermen in the New World New England sat, hopefully, peacefully, in the middle of a flat body of water, the line and the flat-bottomed boat both moving almost imperceptibly. It was a boat for a man who, for days or weeks or months at a time, could live happily with, or without, people.

Both Chris and Bridie, as the long hard Baranof winter drew to a close, both these women who loved him developed a plan of campaign.

Chris interrupted his boatbuilding. "But what are you going to do with it? You've got boats as good as that."

"I thought I wouldn't fish this year—with the tender, I mean, and crew. You're earning money. I don't need much myself—just the few dollars for food and tackle and my little jaunts around the territory."

"That's what I mean. You could come with me to California. Or Honolulu. We could stay away for a month. Until the ice goes out. Just sit in the sun on a beach."

"You're not a girl for sitting in the sun on a beach."

"I can try it, can't I? I'd like, just once, to stand treat. Darling Grampa Thor, you've paid my way all my life until these last two years. You and Grampa Czar."

"You run along, child. Or take him."

"You're already sorry you said that, aren't you? What are you going to do while I'm gone?"

"I could take this new little skiff, and some grub, and just skirt along the shore, very easy, pretend I'm Steller discovering Alaska, and looking for new greens and birds and creatures."

She could not say, "But you look too thin and almost feeble, you're too old for that sort of thing now."

Bridie, in her new spring tweed topcoat for which the Baranof temperature was still far too low, came occasionally to argue with Thor as he went about his boatbuilding there by the waterside so near his one-room cabin. She had You're looking at something completely new in the world of beauty!

Beauty Ice does radiant things to your complexion! Works as a moisturizer to soften and smooth your skin. Works as an astringent to tone your skin and tighten pores. Acts as an invisible facial to stimulate and refresh your face. Restores young dewiness to your skin. It's a product unlike any you've ever known before! Not a liquid, not a cream—but a cool and sparkling, blue-green "solid moisture." Use Beauty Ice in the morning, under makeup; use it at night, after cleansing. It's like bathing your face in champagne! 1.50 plus tax

New, new DESERT FLOWER beauty Ice by SHULTON

THE ONLY MOISTURIZER THAT TIGHTENS PORES!

At leading department and into the cabin before she teetered down oin him as he hammered, sawed, sand-red, calked, painted. Everything inside abin was neat, orderly, shining.

"You're a regular old maid," she announced charming opening gambit. "I don't know you ever got along with the Eskimos, dash the way they are. . . . Oh, there I go n, I always forget. Excuse it, Thor, se."
"Sometimes I think it's a great waste of , being neat in your habits. But I was ught up to do that in those days that seem ar away in another world."
"You're in this world now, Thor Storm,
I'm here to ask you why you don't plan a day for yourself. With Chris, or with Chris me, or alone. You could go to the Old ntry where your folks are. Imagine their s when they see you, like the prodigal son he Bible."
"They're probably all dead by now, Bridie," r told her.
"You ain't, anyway."
"It's an idea. As you say, they might be l to see me."
"Oh, no use talking to you. You and Czar
n. Stiff in the mind as you are in the joints, h of you. Why'n't you stay elastic like me!"
was off, with a jerk at her new spring hat.
w she turned for a parting question.
hat's in that big tin box in your cabin?
u got your money or bonds or whatever ng around on the floor like an old miser, n there's banks in plenty in Baranof?"
He laughed then, throwing back his fine head in a roar of amusement. "Bridie, die, we should have married those years l years ago. I'd have been as successful as Before we set our hearts too much upon anything, see how happy those are who already possess it.

LA ROCHEFOUCAULD

ar and Dave Husack combined, and you'd e been Queen of Alaska."
"Maybe I am now. . . . What's in that box, or Storm?"
"It's my book."
"Finished! You mean the book you've been iting on all these years? Finished!"
"No book is ever really finished, I suppose.
t I think I won't try any more to make it rfect. I've said what I had to say as best I uld."
"You don't sound any too gay about it.
y land! About fifty years writing it, first and st."
"Yes. There's a little note of explanation in e front of it. I want Chris to read it someday on. I want Chris to be the first to read it."

Regretfully, Christine bade him good-by d went off for the first Outside trip she had d since her return to Baranof following the ruptly terminated Seattle experience.
"I'll be away four weeks, but if I don't like I'll just come home."
"Don't do that. Finish what you start."
"Grampa Thor, I wish you'd live in my ouse while I'm away. If only to keep the mice way."
"An old fellow like me wants to stay in his wn lair, like the woods creatures. . . . It's go-g to be kind of restful, both you and Bridie
one. Nobody to nag me about food and tem-er and my bad behavior."
"We love you."

The square-ended skiff was finished. It was strange-looking craft, in some details. It ad, for instance, a plug in the bottom which ould be pulled out by a linked metal chain, lmost like a bathtub plug. On a brisk, flaw-ss May day he hauled the skiff down to the ater's edge. For a full half century and more, om the day he had left his native Norway he ad loved the sea, he and his father and his randfather and generations before them.
During the month he and Ross had mixed ce-ent and skillfully laid a new floor for Chris-ine's garage. He now weighted the boat with some of the residue of this mixture, but not too much. The boat was new and shining. Nobody has ever sat in it before, he thought with satisfaction.

He himself was neat and fresh and clean as the boat into which he now stepped as it lay on the water. Leisurely he rowed out to where he could see the mountains white-topped, the almost heartbreaking blue of the Alaska sky, the pines, the glistening water. It was lovely, it was complete. Now he rested his oars and he lashed himself firmly to the boat, pulling the ropes he had brought with him around his ankles, his knees, his waist. It was his favorite time of day, sunset came late now. The sun was not streaming in bold brassy shafts, it shone golden and warm like Christine's hair.

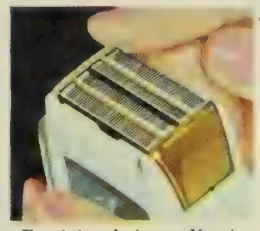
Now was the time. The handy old hand reached out, it pulled the plug with one firm jerk. The concrete-weighted boat sank so that for one brief instant he was standing upright in the water, he saw the mountains, the sky, the trees, the water—the elements and objects he so loved—the water slid over him—ankles—hips—shoulders—head—like a soft silken shroud.

Though she rebelled at first in an agony of tears and self-recrimination, Chris understood after she had read his letter:

"Until now, Christine my dear child, I always have had a mild contempt for people who leave Last Notes. But now I think I understand them a bit. I have gone on that journey we spoke of. My increasing thinness (or should that be decreasing?) was, as you suspected, illness. It would have been a long business, and the pain was becoming too much for me. I thought of you and Bridie nursing me through the months. Your precious energies and time. How foolish, how wasteful. This is better and cleaner and more civilized.

"My work is done. The book is finished. But my work in my beloved Alaska is not finished. You must carry on with that. Not must.

Speedier, closer, too! 4 times as much shaving contact, with exclusive Guard-Comb safety!



The Remington Princess

Exclusive! Princess Guard Combs really care for tender skin. Only with these can a shaver smooth off hair so close, yet so gently you can apply deodorant immediately!

Extra speed — safely! Only Princess shaves back and forth — to shave twice as fast! No "wrong side," no rough side—either side shaves hair out of sight without nick or scrape!

Exciting! Actually 4 times as much shaving contact—shaving action — with every stroke! Truly the world's fastest way to make hair vanish — make legs Princess-smooth.

... for a peach of a shave!

A Product of Remington Rand Electric Shaver, Division of Sperry Rand Corporation, Bridgeport 2, Conn.

I wish to recall that word. I never have said 'must' to you. You are the most dear and lovely thing I have had in my life—you and freedom. I leave you all I have to leave. My book. My love of freedom. My belief in the Dignity and the Spirit of Man, as long as the Human Race shall persist, and in spite of the power and purpose of the Men of Destruction."

Czar Kennedy felt enormously light and exhilarated. He had felt that way for weeks, for months. He couldn't account for it. It wasn't even that he and Chris had come together again, grandfather and grandchild, and he had forgiven her—or as good as forgiven her—for her crazy outburst in the Visitors' Gallery that time in Washington. Of course she hadn't married Bayard Husack yet. But once he was set up in the Governor's Mansion in Juneau, safe and soft, she'd fall into line without even knowing it, smart as she was—or thought she was. He, Czar Kennedy, was smarter. He was smarter than anyone in Baranof. Smarter than anyone in Alaska. Smarter than those big windbags in Seattle, yes, and in San Francisco and New York and Washington too. The laugh would be on them when he died and they opened his will and saw that he had millions and —— But he wasn't going to die. He felt strangely light and potent. He felt that he could do anything. He felt free and young and powerful.

Now when he awoke in the early morning his first almost unconscious sensation was like that he had had when he was a small boy and school was over for the summer. Schoo out, there in the little Massachu town so many years ago, and he one of the boys were going fishin had not been quite aware of wha lovely thing was that was goir happen, he wasn't yet awake. Wa it, what is it? Something lovely is to happen, something lovely has pened. And then he would remen though he never once admitted th himself, once he was awake and conscious. He got up, smiling a without knowing he was smiling, kind of warm, reassuring comfort satisfaction. He did not give it a n But he knew.

He had won. He had survived. Czar Kennedy, was alive. And T Storm was dead.

After Thor's death he had soler told Chris of her grandfather's M wegian background. He had told D Husack too. The lawyers had ope the box in the Seattle bank and ti it all was, sure enough, in the do ments.

Czar had told Christine the det she had been shown the docume she had stared in unbelief. Then, w she heard Czar say, "You're prob a kind of countess or something; y children would be sprung from bility," she broke into laughte vexed merriment, really. "How qu and old-timy." Then, in a suc panic, "You haven't told anyo Please? I hope you haven't told one."

"Person would think you were ing a crime or something."

"They'd kid the life out of me. P wonderful Grampa Thor, how r he was!"

"You ought to be proud of y background."

"I am. I was born in a caribou i blizzard up in the Wood ——"

"Stop that!" he yelled.

But the two got on together m equably than they had before Tho death. They even took little trips gether. Once or twice he had co sented to having Chris fly him in little two-passenger bug which s had purchased out of her own savin He had a kind of pride in his grar daughter's ability to handle a plane, her reputation for skill and reliabil and safety.

Stoutly Czar would say, "I'm modern as the next one. You got keep step with the times while you alive, or you might as well lay dow Nothing to piloting any more th there is to driving a car. Easier, anything, I'd say."

"That's right," Christine agre looking gingerly down at the mou tain range past which they we soaring.

On the trip to the Kennedy co lands Czar himself had suggested th Christine fly him up in her little Mot It was summer, night and day we one. "I could take the train," he sai "or go on the regular Tuesday plan I guess I've got so I haven't the p tience for anything but air nowadays

"I'll fly you. I'd love to. It's noth ing. An hour or less."

Buzzing along contentedly in th little plane, she asked, above the dror of the engine, "Is there anythin wrong at the mine?"

"Not what you'd call critical."

"It can't be too bad if you can f it in one day."

"It's management. Management. you don't watch it all the time th costs go up and the profits dwindl You've got to be on the job yoursel That new fella from Outside, he's sup posed to know coal mining—ma chinery—engineering—loading—th works. He couldn't run a kiddy ca He's overloading, parts wear ou

JIMMIE RODGERS, SINGING STAR OF ROULETTE RECORDS

"You can always tell a HALO girl"

Her hair has that look-again look

You can always tell a Halo Girl,
You can tell by the shine of her hair.
The magic glow of a Halo Girl,
Goes with her everywhere.

The magic of Halo shampoo is pure and simple. Halo's modern cleansing ingredient is the mildest possible . . . the purest possible.

He'll love the satiny shine Halo's rich, rich brightening-and-smoothing lather brings to your hair.

Get that look-again look, today—with pure, sparkling Halo.

HALO glorifies as it cleans

COPYRIGHT 1958 THE COLGATE-PALMOLIVE CO.

quicker than we can replace them. Next thing they'll be bringing coal in from Outside cheaper than I can sell it right here in the territory."

"Don't let things like that upset you too much, Grampa Czar. They're not worth it."

"What do you mean, not worth it? What's more important than you get your work done right and run your business in first-class shape?"

"Well"—and she pointed to the vast world below—"that, for example."

"What about it?" Certainly this particular region was not the spectacular Alaska of mountain peaks and great gray waters. It was the flatlands that they were approaching. Coal lands.

"It's so exciting."

"What's exciting about it?"

"Being alive, for one thing. And knowing that all this used to be forest once upon a time."

"Who says so?"

"The historians, the geologists. Books."

"Oh—books." He rejected this feeble source. "Thor talk."

"Don't!" she said sharply. Then, reminding herself that this was an old man, this vital, inwardly seething Czar Kennedy was an

During the days of knights, men of chivalry took great pride in their appearance. Since soap was unknown, colognes and spiced goose grease were the favorites of immaculate gentlemen.

Perfumed and spiced goose grease was extremely expensive, and so it was frequently used as presents to men of position from whom favor was sought. At the presentation of such a gift, the donor would comment that he had brought same "grease for the palms."

By the sixteenth century, bribes had reached the present-day levels of more tangible values, but from this ancient custom we derive our present-day expression: "Greasing the palm." ROBERT M. BEASLEY old man, "They say all this was tropical once upon a time. Millions of years ago. Enormous forests of trees. Because of course coal is just hardened trees and stuff. Carbonized trees."

"I remember that," he admitted grudgingly. "It's interesting, real interesting to think about, like you said."

They glided expertly down to the runway and the somewhat apprehensive mine manager from Outside who was awaiting Czar.

"You want to come down in the mine, Christine? I'm going down before lunch. That's what I'm here for."

"Sure, sure," the manager said nervously. "Come on down, Miss Storm."

"I won't go now," Christine said. "Maybe after lunch. I don't like coal mines much. I'm going over to have a little chat with Mrs. Boone at the store. I'll meet you at twelve-thirty at Boone's."

Czar turned abruptly with a gesture to the man. He would look, he had decided. He would just say nothing, but he would look into everything, he would be calm and quiet and ask this and that, and then when he had the whole story he would blast. Who did they think they were fooling!

An hour in the company office. Figures. Statistics. "Maybe it's a little too late to go down now, Mr. Kennedy. Maybe you'd better wait with that till after your lunch."

"Lunch! I'm here to work, not eat. You go on, eat your lunch. I'm going down."

"Oh, no, Mr. Kennedy."

"I knew coal mining before you were out of diapers. I want to ramble around alone. Scat!"

He was enjoying himself really. This was wrong, that was wrong, the lunks! By two o'clock he'd have it all in line. He'd give them the big or-else and buzz back with Chris in time for dinner in Baranof. What a world. Like Christine said, the kid was right. Exciting.

He watched the chunky heavy-laden coal cars coming down the grade like fat old ladies cautiously descending a hill in San Francisco. He laughed to himself, rather fancying this mental figure of speech. Then he thought, They're not being cautious enough. Look at that! Too fast. So that's how they been wearing them out, and the machinery too! Why don't they brake them like I always used to? I'll jump one of the cars, go down and give them the works right from the coal pile. He waited, tense, at the side of the narrow track, poised ready to jump as the laden car passed by him, to jump aboard as he had a hundred times in his younger days. The car reached him, he jumped, but the muscles had lost their elasticity. They pulled him up, but he was short of the goal. He fell under the car with its iron wheels and its tons of coal. The wheels jolted over him and he rolled again and again and again. The coal car scurried on smugly as one who has done a thorough job.

There were no telephones from town to town. Alaska's natural barriers and vast distances had thus far defied this bridging.

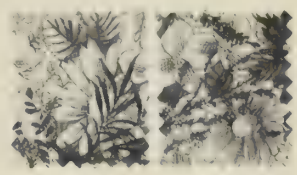
Alaska Communications Service, then. ACS. Baranof Baranof. Paul Barnett. The Lode office. Bridie Ballantyne. Ott Decker. Territorial Police. Judge Gannon . . . Ross Guildenstern. . . . "He's a pilot. If he can get hold of a plane. If he's in. In Baranof, I mean. My little plane won't do, it won't carry—no, I won't fly back without Grampa Czar. . . . If Ross can get a plane ——"

His reply came so quickly that they had had scarcely time for more than two or three messages.

LEAVING CAN DO ABOUT HALF HOUR PAUL AND GANNON WITH ME DONT TRY BE BRAVE WATCH SKY WAIT FOR ME ROSS.

END

Designed exclusively for Sanitone by Elsé of Elsé, Inc.



One of these dresses is brand-new...the other has been Sanitone Dry Cleaned a half-dozen times. Which is which?

If they were your own dresses, and you examined them critically, you probably couldn't tell "which is which," either. For Sanitone's exclusive Cotton Clinic Service has a special magic for cottons. It cleans them ...gently but wonderfully, spotlessly CLEAN . . . then brings back their original fabric newness with Sanitone's own, exclusive Style-Set® Finish. They look, feel, fit and even resist soil just as they did when brand-new! Sanitone Cotton Clinic Service actually gives your cherished cottons...suits, slacks, casuals and gala wear...a longer span of newness! Try Sanitone, just once...it's the world's best way to save more by spending less for new Spring and Summer cottons!

Consult the yellow pages of your phone directory for Sanitone Approved Service

Sanitone Dry Cleaning Service

A Division of Emery Industries, Inc., Carew Tower, Cincinnati 2, Ohio

Ask your Sanitone Dry Cleaner to show you actual swatches from this amazing 2 Cotton Dress Test. See for yourself how Style-Set Finish makes Sanitone-cleaned cottons fresh and lovely as when brand-new!

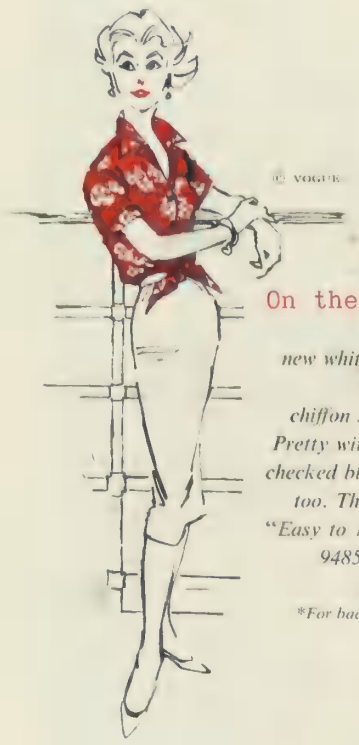
The time is summer, the mood exciting.

Barbara J. can afford a glamorous vacation trip because she's learned:

How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing!

Barbara has been adding to and organizing her wardrobe for exactly a year and ten months. She now owns enough basics to take her around the world (several times) and still not be at a loss for something to wear! Her vacation cruise may not be quite so all-encompassing mileage-wise, but it does take her to almost as many climates. For this she carefully chooses her travel wardrobe from all her past purchases. Her only additions are very small dollar-wise. These are light, very bright separates to interchange to make a happy vacation even gayer.

By BET HART



Going aboard and for flying back . . .
Barbara carries her red coat bought almost two years ago, wears her beige knit dress, a spring carry-over. Her wardrobe of scarves supplies the changes.

PRIGENT

Evenings on the town,
Barbara wears her new blouse, white chiffon skirt bought well over a year ago.

© VOGUE

On the high seas,
Barbara likes her new white skirt. Her cherry cardigan and white chiffon scarf for cool days. Pretty with her pink-and-red checked blouse from January too. The blouse is Vogue's "Easy to Make" Design No. 9485, worn tied at the front or tucked in.*

For back view, sizes and price, see page 155*

Sight-seeing where it's cool, Barbara wears her black jersey suit (her very first and very basic investment). This and her beige dress are her two and only two costumes for sight-seeing.

Barbara's fashion investment for her vacation comes in three parts: two of white Arnel sharkskin, one in a gay rose cotton print. The white sleeveless top comes straight to the hipline, has a round cardigan neckline which takes to bright scarves and jewelry; the skirt is classic and slim. Together Barbara finds them ideal for shipboard. She can also mix them to add a vacation mood to separates from other months.

Parties on ship or shore . . .
Barbara wears her white lace dress, bought last November. This and her red flower-print dress purchased in April are her two dressy costumes.

SEPARATES BY DOROTHY KORBY

Halfway there.
Last summer's pink shorts, her new white top . . . or her pink check shirt or new print blouse.

M. MacGowan

Vacation fashion $'s

White sharkskin "suit"	$12.95
Print blouse (to make)	3.28
White linen pumps	6.95
TOTAL	$23.18

Last-minute memo....

Be sure summer basic (red dress bought last month) is clean and hanging neatly in the closet to be worn upon return.

New Avon Ideas for a Beautiful Summer

"Avon Calling" means a visit with your Avon Representative who brings to your home fragrances and cosmetics you try on yourself.

Rich Moisture Suds—A non-drying skin wash to make you feel brand new!

Strawberry Cooler—A quick, cooling home facial for a wonderful pick-up!

Pink Lace—Delectable new shade for lips and fingertips. In Satin Sheen Lipstick . . . cream and pearly Nail Polish.

Persian Wood Powder Sachet—how cool and fragrant this will be, on your skin or lingerie!

Spray Essence—a spray-on so concentrated it lasts like perfume, yet every woman can afford it. In six of Avon's famous fragrances.

Do have an Avon try-on to select fragrances and cosmetics when your Avon Representative calls.

© AVON cosmetics
RADIO CITY, NEW YORK

AVAILABLE ONLY THROUGH YOUR AVON REPRESENTATIVE WHO CALLS AT YOUR HOME

COPYRIGHT 1958, AVON PRODUCTS, INC.

Nothing can dim the sparkle of your holiday!

Your eyes bright with delight . . . your laughter vibrant and gay! How you revel in the fun of summer! You're sparkling, alive—enjoying yourself as never before—even on "difficult" days. Like millions, you find complete freedom, complete comfort, complete security in Tampax® internal sanitary protection. For Tampax lets you do what you want, whenever you want! It's the modern way!

TAMPAX

SO MUCH A PART OF YOUR ACTIVE LIFE

Tampax Incorporated, Palmer, Mass.

FACE OF THE TIGER

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 47

Lou had had an early introduction to Mrs. Gifford when Miss Patton, the major's secretary, had asked her to meet the train Mrs. Gifford was arriving on. "Know her?" repeated Miss Patton. "Oh, you'll know her all right. She'll be wearing moth-eaten minks and a nice fresh snarl, and she'll have that enormous child with her. But we love her," said Miss Patton, growing brisker, "because her husband is Gifford Valves."

Lou wrote a memo about the heater and dropped it into the wire basket on the edge of her desk. The Coastline Club could not have functioned without that basket; it housed the station-wagon keys, notes from Miss Patton and Lou to Max about things that had to be done instantly, occasional sharp retorts from Max. Somehow everything, or almost everything, got taken care of.

The pile of menus beside Lou's typewriter mounted. The distant sounds of breakfast in the dining room died away, knots of people formed and dissolved in the deep cool lobby. A golf foursome departed, two women in shorts and sunglasses strolled into the drawing room opposite the office and out again. They were evidently waiting for someone, and scraps of conversation penetrated the clatter of the typewriter:

"Fat? My dear, a balloon on legs."

"Doesn't she diet?"

"Well, she says she's on grapefruit, but she must be swallowing them whole."

And then all at once they were talking about Dana Mallory, Mrs. John Mallory. Lou listened unabashedly, because it was Mrs. Mallory who had got her this job.

"Have you seen Dana yet? Two heart attacks, and she turns up looking marvelous."

"She and John are such a wonderful couple, aren't they?"

"So Darby and Joan. It's really touching."

There was a pause and a small laugh. "Maybe if you had a heart attack Hal would stay home nights."

"It's sweet of you to think of it, but we couldn't possibly swing it this year."

The two women wandered into view, and Lou fitted carbons and paper into the typewriter and began to type again. She had known about Mrs. Mallory's initial heart attack because it had been in the newspapers—Paige Cracker Heiress Stricken—and she had wondered whether she ought to send flowers or a note. In the end, reasoning that Mrs. Mallory had probably forgotten all about her, Lou had done nothing at all.

Mrs. Mallory hadn't forgotten her. Only the day before Lou had met her in the driveway outside the house the Mallorys had taken for the summer, and Mrs. Mallory, walking slowly with a gray-haired nurse who was pushing a carriage, had stopped and smiled and said, "Hello, Miss Fabian, how are you? Have you met Richard?"

Richard was not acknowledging introductions at the moment; he slept in the carriage under a featherweight of blue wool. Dana, smiling at him, glanced up at Lou again. "As soon as we get a little more settled, you must come and see him when he's awake."

One of the waiting women in the lobby said impatiently, "Where in the world ——" and turned her head. "Oh, there she comes. By the way, did I tell you I had a card from Maude Heffernan? They were in Barbados."

Lou typed blindly, and then shut her eyes tightly and opened them again on the windows, the sunlit terrace with pale spilling petunias along the edge. It was no good; windows and sunlight and stilled typewriter keys played a cruel trick of memory. Her wrists hurt flashingly under the wide leaf-thin silver bracelets, and that was another trick. Scars couldn't hurt after a year.

She was tense and trembling, even though her fingers lifted and fell, making a swift competent clatter. Above the noise, someone said patiently, "Any mail for Ingalls?"

How long had he stood at the barrier, watching her? Lou sent a brief glance at his face, said crisply, "Just a minute, Mr. Ingalls, I'll see," and walked to the rows of little boxes.

There was nothing under "I" and she said so, realizing that his eyes on hers were absent and puzzled. They lowered to her hands and flickered up again. "While I'm here, is there anything for Mallory?"

Lou hesitated. The man at the barrier said, "It's all right. I'm a cousin of Mrs. Mallory's. I'm staying at the house." He nodded invitingly at the switchboard. "Call, by all means."

Lou felt as foolish as she had been intended to feel. There were two letters for the Mallorys and she handed them over in silence. Ingalls thanked her and went out.

Lou went back to her typewriter and inserted fresh paper and carbon. Voices drifted into and out of her consciousness until five minutes of eleven. She was aware of the time because Major Soames and Miss Patton generally came into the office at eleven, and the major was irritable about desktops. His own and Miss Patton's were bare and shining; Lou swept pencils and memo pads into her center drawer, stacked the completed pile of menus. She was trying to strike a nice balance between neatness and what looked like complete inactivity when the switchboard rattled.

IN 1957:

More children UNDER 5 were hit by CRIPPLING POLIO than any other age group

GET SALK SHOTS
FOR YOUR CHILD NOW!

THE NATIONAL FOUNDATION FOR INFANTILE PARALYSIS

The orange light was in the top row, which meant it was the kitchen or one of the outbuildings, the annex or golf shop or the locker rooms. Lou opened the switch and said, "Hello."

What came over the wire was scarcely more than a whisper. It said, "I know who you are, Miss Fabian. Does Major Soames know?" and then the receiver went down with a very gentle click.

The pink house, the club's only accommodation larger than a cabin, stood on a knoll between the curving arms of the great Y the driveway made as it neared the cabins and ultimately the clubhouse. Stone steps had been set into the sloping bank at the front and a small lawn carved out of the woods at the back; otherwise it was screened by pines and beeches. Glimpses of the Sound were visible from its black-shuttered upper windows.

Ingalls returned to it wondering idly about the girl in the office. She reminded him of a charcoal drawing, done with the lightest of touches, except for her eyes, so vividly colored that they drew the gaze involuntarily when her lashes lifted. He had seen her before somewhere, but those eyes had come as a distinct shock. A newspaper reproduction, then? Ingalls put it hopefully out of his mind, but he knew it would come back.

He didn't particularly like country clubs. But then he hadn't expected to like it; he was here paying a debt to his conscience.

He was only Dana's third cousin, but they had seen a lot of each other in the course of growing up and his adult life had been studded with wires and telephone calls and cables from Dana. She liked excitement and dramatics and hair-tearings. All her colds were pneumonia, a fit of depression was a nervous breakdown. She read great hidden tensions into the few calm people among her acquaintance, and when all else failed she espoused a spectacularly lost cause.

There had been widespread consternation when Dana married John Mallory two years ago. Everybody liked John Mallory; it was impossible not to. He was ten years older than Dana, and if he had a sense of humor it was a well-kept secret, but he was quiet and calm and completely normal. It had been a surprisingly successful marriage to date. At least Ingalls heard that it was; some Puritan streak had kept him from seeing much of his cousin since he had taken over as advertising manager of Paige Crackers. He had been godfather to the child who was presently born, and he had spent a long weekend once at the house on Long Island.

And now there was this heart attack. John was in Chicago—for only four days, but things could come up, planes got delayed. Dana, telephoning Ingalls, had said simply, "Sam, could you come?"

Ingalls had taken the next train.

She was better now, of course, but as he mounted the stone steps with her letters in his hand he wondered uneasily how much better. She still lived in a carefully insulated world, and took an afternoon nap as religiously as her anticoagulant. What worried Ingalls was the docility with which she lived. That was Dana, aware of her heart's functioning, probably quieting the little flutter of panic that came from the very awareness, assuring her heart that she wasn't going to give it anything extra to do.

She was in the living room when he came in, reading. The dark hair that grew back in a widow's peak was smooth and shining, and her skin was luminous. She was only three years younger than Ingalls, but shell glasses that kept sliding down her nose gave her the air of a child pretending to read. Ingalls handed her the letters.

Dana glanced at them and made a face. "Thank you for nothing."

Ingalls poured himself a cup of coffee. "Who's the girl in the office?"

"Miss Fabian, I think her name is. Attractive, isn't she?"

"Very," said Ingalls equably. "I've seen her before somewhere."

Dana glanced sharply at him. She said with an air of discovery, "That Massine chalk of mine, in the living room at home. She's rather like it, isn't she? I think that's why I ——"

Ingalls returned the sharp look.

"—— think she's attractive," said Dana lamely. "Where is that idiot, Miss Rockett?"

"Take a letter, Miss—er—take a letter," said Major Soames.

In a dream, not even worrying about her shaky shorthand, Lou took out her notebook and a sharp pencil. Does Major Soames know? It was somehow incredible that he did not; he had come into the office just as Lou snatched the line out of the switchboard, and the whisper that it had carried seemed to her to fill the office.

She thought, but she was not quite sure, that the jeering, menacing call had come from the golf shop. If she had placed the light more accurately, if she had not disconnected the call so blindly, if Miss Patton and Major Soames had not entered the office just then ——

Beyond the windows cars, mostly station wagons, jockeyed out of the parking space and filtered down the drive. Guests strolled slowly across the grass. Keep looking at them while the major composed his thoughts, keep the sick churning down; if worse came to worst, look at the major.

In his late sixties, Stephen Soames still retained his massive shoulders, most of his height, and just enough straying gray hair, rooted in black, to make a cunning display under his senatorial hats. When in residence at the club he leaned heavily toward suède sports coats, gray flannels and the latest, loudest thing in vests; on his periodic trips to New York he was garbed in such sober splendor that taxi drivers and hotel employees cowered instinctively. There was an almost Dickensian amount of chicanery and guile behind the eyes under the tufted and graying brows.

"To the Whitehall Painting Contractors. Gentlemen," said Major Soames musingly, and embarked on what seemed to be an arbitrary withholding of fifty dollars from the sum owed on the painting of the club outbuildings. Lou's fingers steadied as she wrote.

With the letter finished, Major Soames grew good-humored. He passed Lou's desk on his

CONTINUED ON PAGE 97

How to live with a sweet tooth and LOVE IT!

A sweet tooth is fun with non-fattening SWEETA. One or two drops sweeten your favorite iced drink deliciously...without adding a single calorie. Get it at your pharmacy...

SWEETA made by SQUIBB

© Olin Mathieson Chemical Corp., 1958

Brush better in the DANGER ZONE
where 4 out of 5 cavities strike. Use the brush that's bent like your dentist's mirror, the

SQUIBB
ANGLE TOOTHBRUSH

SQUIBB 1600

PETAL HAT BY JOHN FREDERICS ©1958, MAX FACTOR & CO.

Now...a fluid make-up that's streak-proof! Looks petal perfect every time!

Here, at last, is a fluid make-up so easy to apply it glides on smoothly, perfectly every time. So smoothly, even a rose will envy your new, petal perfect complexion. Max Factor's Hi-Fi never streaks or looks "made-up" because it's not watery or greasy like ordinary make-ups.

Its featherlight texture actually blends the instant it touches your skin. Suddenly your complexion is lighted with a radiant, rose petal finish. And every little flaw seems to melt away. Now, in 8 flattering Hi-Fi skin tones, $1.75 plus tax.

For a "Try Size" send your skin tone (fair, ivory, medium, ruddy, olive or tan) and 25¢ to Max Factor, Dept. HL, P.O. Box 941, Hollywood 28, California.

Max Factor's hi-fi Fluid Make-up

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 95

way out of the office, said appreciatively, "What charming bracelets," and had sauntered off down the lobby before she was fully recovered.

That was the end of the late-morning lull. Miss Patton came in to sit on the edge of Lou's desk and go expertly through the contents of the wire basket. The major's secretary was that total anomaly, a tall willowy blonde with languid blue eyes and a shrewd, sure intelligence.

She said when she came to the note about Mrs. Gifford's heater, "She does it every year!" and paused reflectively. "Call the Sewards; they've got one."

Lou had to think hard to recollect the Sewards, a pleasant fiftyish couple in Cabin 3. "But won't they mind?"

Miss Patton turned on her way out of the office. "Not if you tell them it has to go for repairs," she said reproachfully. "I'm in the kitchen if the major wants me."

The Sewards parted innocently with their heater. Max, entering the office by the back way, had to be persuaded to pick it up and deliver it.

The clubwomen were beginning to arrive. Miss Patton covered the switchboard while Lou had a sandwich and coffee in the supply room at the back of the office.

It was a narrow slit of a room, its shelves stacked with boxed paper and envelopes, old addressing-machine files, cartons full of dusty documents. There was a curtain at the door over all this chaos, and Lou, eating her rapid lunch, felt as though she had gone to cover.

Uselessly, though; the whisperer had made that clear.

Who?

Not Dana Mallory, who knew the whole story. That would be pointless in the extreme. Her cousin, the man who had stood at the barrier—Ingalls? Mrs. Mallory would have told him, of course, but he hadn't looked like an anonymous phone caller. On the other hand, people who dealt in secrecy didn't go around placarding themselves.

Did her own face, thinner now and stripped of its unthinking confidence, carry a courtroom stamp? Lou got up to look at herself in the mirror, hung crookedly at the end of the supply room, but it told her only that her lipstick needed repairing.

At the doorway, Max put his head around the curtain. "Did you take a reservation for Smithwick, supposed to come in tonight?"

"Yes," said Lou. "Are they on the phone? I'll be right out."

At four o'clock she was free, her time her own until eight the next morning. Every day, unless it was actually pouring, that had meant the beach. Today was hot, and the morning's blue sky had turned glaring and no-colored, but there was something to do before she went swimming, before she did anything.

Lou had been given a cabin of her own, which had surprised her until she discovered a number of obvious reasons why. It was the farthest from the clubhouse, almost a quarter of a mile down the wandering elm-lined drive. A tree had gone through the roof during last year's hurricane, and there were water stains on the ceilings and walls. And it was next to Cabin 11, customarily allotted to people with small children, in this case the Damons.

Apart from the water stains, and furniture which had been juggled out of other cabins as replacements were made, Lou's was a replica of the rest. Wooden steps led up to a tiny screened porch, and the little living room beyond held a small-scale couch, two chairs, a grass rug and an occasional table. Beyond that were the pine-shaded bedroom and bath. Double cabins, like the Damons', were equipped with a tiny kitchenette.

Lou used her key and went straight into the bedroom. Its window looked out on the square of grass behind Cabin 11, where Mrs. Damon, her blond hair falling beside her face, was bending over a bassinet. Lou got her bathing suit and threw her toweling robe on the bed beside it, and then went to her suitcase and took the newspaper clippings from their hiding place among the pages of an old Atlantic Monthly. The Atlantic Monthly would not be apt to interest the maids.

It wasn't morbidity that had made her keep the clippings, but a stubborn feeling that someday she might have a use for them. Lou studied the two blurred reproductions of her own face. One profile, one three-quarter view, with the hair that she had worn differently then changing the molding of forehead and cheeks.

No. It was a certainty. No one, a year later, could have identified her positively with that pale bewildered face. Whoever had called her from the golf shop had been told—or had been there.

What to do now? Wait and see?

A ten-minute walk took her to the club beach. It was a deep crescent of sand, protected by land at one end and a breakwater at the other; toward the breakwater, and away from the striped cabanas, the sand gave way to stones. Lou liked that end; there was nothing sticky about the clean heat of the stones when she came out dripping, and even the water had an air of privacy.

It was shockingly cold when she dived in; by the time she had surfaced and begun to strike out her skin felt cased in silk. She swam easily and well, the sweep of her arms economical, her kick steady and controlled. Tension slid away. Fifty yards out, she turned and suspended herself in the water, looking back at the pale-gold beach. From this distance, the clubhouse was a child's model perched on a green swell of lawn. A sea gull swooped for a closer look at this invasion of its territory, and Lou, mocked by the lazy liquid curve, followed it as far as the breakwater.

It wasn't full high tide, and the rocks were slippery where they reared from the water. Lou, winded from her short fast pursuit of the gull, took without question the hand that came helpfully over the edge of the rocks to grasp hers. She found a foothold and swung herself up, breathless.

It was Ingalls who had watched her approach and who now, somehow, held both her hands. He had been swimming earlier, and he looked tall and surprisingly dark against the sun-blanched sky. Lou blinked the water from her lashes and saw that he was staring at her wrists.

Her hands went stiff in his, but she made no effort to release them. The chill of the water had deepened the color of the scars that her bracelets hid when she wasn't swimming or asleep.

Ingalls dropped her hands and met her eyes calmly. "You're Louise Royce," he said.

"Yes." She looked directly into Ingalls' grayish eyes, and heard her own voice, clear and detached as a stranger's. "Yes, I'm Louise Royce. Is it all coming back to you now, Mr. Ingalls?"

She was Louise Royce, but she couldn't remember ever having been called anything but Lou. Her mother had died when she was in high school; she was twenty-three when her father suffered the stroke that forced his retirement from a professorship at a Massachusetts university.

The move to New York had seemed logical. Money was going to be of the essence, and Lou would have to earn more than she did as society, obituary and features editor of the local newspaper. She had never had business training, but she had typed so many papers for her father that she had taught herself the touch system out of self-defense. When they had been in New York a week she put a boldly glowing ad for her services as a manuscript typist in the Times.

The responses came down to two in the end. One was an elderly roué at the Waldorf who was considering his memoirs; when he caressed Lou's hand lingeringly, as though in search of invisible typing muscles, she fled. The other was Mrs. Harmon Heffernan, who turned out mildly torrid romances under the pseudonym of Elinor Saint.

The Heffernans lived on Long Island, which meant a longish way to commute, but the salary was surprisingly good for a part-time job. The household consisted of Mrs. Heffernan, her husband, an even-tempered, chalk-striped banker, their infant daughter, a maid and a cook. The house was in Watermead. The winged white-brick, with its lawn and shrub-enclosed garden behind, had a pleasantly leisured air, and the study where Lou was to work was a constant dapple of sun and shadow.

Mrs. Heffernan herself was a small, untidy fortyish woman, almost as sweet as one of her own heroines. She lived in a state of placid contentment with her husband, the child she had never expected to bear, and her current work in progress: Lila's Way. She was instantly contented with Lou. "I know we're going to like each other, Miss Royce. I could tell the moment you walked in the door."

And Lou did like Mrs. Heffernan. All in all, it was a pleasant job, and it went on that way until the tenth of June.

The tenth of June turned out to be the Heffernans' twelfth wedding anniversary, but it was also a Thursday. The servants were off that day. There were a number of telephone calls for Mrs. Heffernan, which Lou answered in the maid's absence, and at almost twelve o'clock Mrs. Heffernan appeared in the study.

She said, "I do hope it isn't an inconvenience for you, Miss Royce, staying with the baby this afternoon. I'll tell you what, I'll fix us both a nice cold martini and then we'll have ——"

Lou could not help looking blank. Mrs. Heffernan said reproachfully, "But I told you yesterday, don't you remember? Some friends are driving us up to Connecticut for dinner, for our anniversary, and as Martha doesn't get back until six you said you'd stay until then. If you've made other arrangements —— Oh, dear ——"

There was nothing to do but submit, although her father was in the hospital and she had planned to make her usual visit. Lou hated martinis, but she drank one anyway, because Mrs. Heffernan seemed to be watching her anxiously for signs of sullenness and she didn't want to spoil an anniversary. After a chicken sandwich and strawberries in the dining room she went back to the study and Lila's Way.

At two, Mr. Heffernan arrived home from his Manhattan bank; at three, Mrs. Heffernan put the baby out in her carriage in the garden and came back into the study. "She's had her applesauce and her bottle, Miss Royce, so she shouldn't let out a peep while you're here, and Martha will be back at six. If you could just watch and see that she doesn't get in the sun —— Oh, and if anyone calls, we'll be back this evening. Why don't you take a book and stretch out in a chair on the lawn?"

And then they were gone.

Lou did not stretch out in a chair. As soon as the Heffernans had departed, she went out and looked gingerly at six-month-old Amy, who was sleeping peacefully under the mosquito netting. The house when she went back to it seemed eerily quiet, echoing to the sound of the typewriter, and she was glad when she had finished the last of the pages.

She looked at the baby again, and moved the carriage out of the sun and into the shadow of the lilac hedge. The study could stand tidying and she occupied herself with that for

NEXT MONTH

"Come quickly—please!"

Young Dr. David Blair answered that frantic cry for help in the dark hours of the night and found that it led to a trap that could mean death for five people—one of them the girl David loved. There was one hope, a slender thread of telephone wire, and the wit and courage of the girl who answered the

NIGHT CALL

By CHARLOTTE ARMSTRONG

Novelette complete in the July JOURNAL

Color your Hair and be lovelier so easily...in minutes!

NESTLE COLORINSE
Glorifies your natural hair shade with glamorous color-highlights and silken sheen. Removes dulling soap film. Quickly rinses in — shampoos out! In 12 exciting shades. 29¢

NESTLE COLORTINT
Intensifies your natural hair shade OR adds thrilling NEW color. Blends-in gray. More than a rinse but not a permanent dye. Lasts through 3 shampoos! 10 beautiful shades. 29¢

NESTLE COLOR CREME RINSE
Colors and conditions gray and white hair. Quickly banishes yellow streaks. Adds the beautiful lustre of youth. 6 shades 29¢, 75¢

Nestle
COLORS YOUR HAIR
WITHOUT BLEACHING or DYEING

a while. At a quarter to five there was nothing to do but—what?

Lou went out and looked at Amy. The afternoon was soft and blowy. The Heffernans' friends obviously knew that they were not home; the door chimes and telephone were silent. Birds sang, underlining the human silence, and there was smoke curling gently out of a window at the corner of the house.

Even then, her heart stunned with alarm, Lou remembered to look at the baby. Amy slept under her pale-pink coverlet, and Lou's flying legs carried her on into the house.

There was just a whiff of smoke in the study. It deepened as she ran through the dining room and living room to the long windowed porch in the other wing of the house. And here were the flames, with a sound more vivid than their coloring. Traveling up the banked curtains, licking thirstily out through the open windows—to catch the sun-dried ivy, the shutters, the roof? There was a telephone on the desk at the end of the porch. Lou seized wildly at the curtain that was aflame, and her grip brought the rod with its burning valance down squarely across her wrists. She heard herself scream even before her brain registered the full measure of pain.

But she reached the phone. She was crying soundlessly by that time, and the linen skirt she had swept out of the way of the flames was like sandpaper on her burned flesh. She gasped the necessary words into the telephone, and then it crossed her whole body like a fresh sear that a burning leaf, or a spark, might have drifted to the mosquito netting that covered Amy Heffernan.

She needn't have worried. By the time she had reached the lawn, with the distant sound of sirens in her ears, Amy Heffernan was gone.

"The Heffernan case, Mr. Ingalls. Surely you remember that? Everybody does."

"But they caught the kidnaper," said Ingalls. "Veuchen. He went to the chair two months ago."

The kidnaper, Peter Veuchen. He turned out to be, as kidnapers so often were, a casual and almost invisible agent, a delivery man for the Marvel Cleaners. He was a naturalized citizen, thirty-two years old, with a recently acquired wife and a handsome, cheerful face. He was also, the presiding judge said, one of the few genuinely amoral people within the memory of the court. Confronted with the remains of Amy Heffernan, who had died of exposure in a Long Island swamp, he had looked and then glanced coolly away. Queried as to motive, he had shrugged in real puzzlement; wasn't seventy-five thousand dollars enough?

Harmon Heffernan swore that he had paid the seventy-five thousand, in unmarked fifties and twenties and tens, to a person purporting to be the kidnaper. Veuchen swore that the sum had been incomplete, but this was discounted at once. As the death sentence was mandatory, Veuchen had nothing to gain by being helpful, and nothing to lose by the arrogance which he clearly enjoyed before lapsing into an even more arrogant silence. Forty thousand dollars of the ransom money was eventually discovered at his brother-in-law's farm.

Had there been a payoff to an accomplice? Even apart from the actual mechanics of the crime, it was odd that the Heffernans, who lived well but not lavishly, should have been picked as victims. The maid and the cook, both of whom had been in the household for a number of years, were investigated and found to be blameless. The typist, perhaps?

Veuchen seemed in some twisted way to insist on all the credit for the crime. But Louise Royce, young and single, made interesting copy, particularly when the elevator operator in her building remembered that she had gone out late the night before the kidnaping, although it had been pouring rain.

There was no way of proving that worry and depression about her father had driven her out of the silent apartment, that she hadn't gone to meet Peter Veuchen. And Mrs. Heffernan, bewildered with grief, kept repeating that of course Miss Royce had known they were going to be in Connecticut that Thursday, they had discussed it the day before.

The single martini that Mrs. Heffernan had coaxed upon Lou became, when the newspapers were through with it, an orgy indulged in when her employers had left the house. Her family finances were gone into. Money had been an anxiety, hadn't it, even before a second stroke had sent her father off for an expensive stay in the hospital?

There was no official accusation, but under the pressure of public opinion the hospital finally disclosed that the day before Veuchen's arrest, an envelope containing five hundred dollars in fifty-dollar bills had been dropped through its mail slot. A typed message on cheap white stationery said merely, "Enclosed for the account of Mr. Gregory Royce."

Both note and envelope had been handled past the fingerprinting stage, and were of the kind sold widely in drugstores and five-and-tens. The type didn't match that of Gregory Royce's ancient Underwood, or Mrs. Heffernan's new pale-gray Royal, but then that would be the most elementary precaution.

Lou's burns saved her, and—the bitterest thing of all—the fact that her father died while undergoing surgery. Sympathy shifted. There was no proof that the bills received by the hospital were part of the ransom money. And Veuchen had admitted to studying the house, kidnaping the child, and later abandoning it because it cried. A watch was kept on Veuchen's apartment for a few months, in the hope of uncovering something that would lead to the rest of the ransom money, but officially the Heffernan case was closed.

Ingalls was frowning a little. He said, "So that's that. You got your name dragged into something you had nothing to do with, and you got a very dirty deal, but it's over with."

"It isn't over with," Lou said flatly. "People remember kidnapings and everybody connected with them long after they forget other things. I've found that out. And everybody wonders if there was someone behind Veuchen." She looked dispassionately at her scarred wrists. "So do I, for that matter. You've been wondering yourself, haven't you, ever since your cousin told you about me?"

"My cousin didn't tell me, as it happens. I was there one day in court, with a friend who was covering the trial. Dana may not have all the virtues," said Ingalls brusquely, "but she doesn't break trusts."

Lou's head snapped up. "I'm very grateful to your cousin, Mr. Ingalls, but if you had any idea how I loathe being a trust!"

She fastened the strap of her bathing cap again and dived from the edge of the rocks, knowing and not caring that she had been indefensibly rude. Behind her, she heard Ingalls say something short and explosive, and then she was in the water and swimming.

A huge bright beach ball skidded across the water as Lou's feet touched sand, and Mr. Appleford, of Cabin 5, came splashing noisily in its wake. Mr. Appleford was the kind of guest who promptly cast off upon arrival whatever repressions bound him the rest of the year; he was undampened by his cold, dark-haired, well-modulated wife. He was usually in the clubhouse before anyone else, ready to organize golf foursomes or tennis doubles or water games. He twinkled at Lou, said, "Hello there—oops!" and retrieved his ball and splashed off again.

Had it been a man's voice that whispered at her, or a woman's?

Lou put on her robe and sandals, picked up her towel and started back to her cabin. It was going to rain tonight; the sky was tarnishing, the golf greens glowed in the subtle change of light. Mrs. Damon was feeding her little pink baby on the cabin porch. She stood up as Lou approached, waved the empty bottle triumphantly, and disappeared inside.

She had gone in because it was time for the baby's nap, of course. Not because Louise Royce was coming.

And this, Lou thought clearly, was exactly how she had been intended to feel: stared at, recognized, recoiled from. She knew the feeling well, because she had lost two jobs before she met Mrs. Mallory on Eighth Street. The first was in a bookshop; it was three months before a very good customer complained to the owner that she hardly felt safe, browsing around while her small daughter was in another room under the eye of Louise Royce. The second was in a publishing house, where, almost instantly, knots of girls formed at other desks and rumors wreathed the air like smoke. The office manager had been apologetic but firm.

John Mallory had had a business acquaintance with Harmon Heffernan, and Mrs. Mallory was therefore on the interested fringe. She had insisted on taking Lou to lunch and asking questions. "Can you take shorthand? Because if you could, or if you could learn —— Better give me your telephone number."

That was where the Coastline Club job had come from. She took ten hours of shorthand instruction, enough to give her a kind of bemused mastery over it, and sublet the tiny Morton Street apartment.

She didn't discover until she had been at the club for a few days that Dana Mallory's father had put up a good deal of money for it, but a number of other things about the place were quickly apparent. It was a relatively new club, frankly and naïvely snobbish. The majority of its one hundred members were from New York or New Jersey; the rest comprised the odder element of the town, like the fashionable psychiatrist who could often be heard making waspish diagnoses in the lobby. Theoretically there was a committee to pass on applications for membership, but the committee was Major Soames, who relied on his own keen nose for money, and Miss Patton's shrewdly assessing eye. There were golf memberships and tennis memberships and golf-and-tennis memberships, but what kept the club going were the full memberships, including the facilities of the beach and the children's pool, and the profitable rental of the cabins.

Lou liked it, on the whole—but somebody wanted her out of here. The whisper that had cut through her changed appearance and her

CONTINUED ON PAGE 100

"They all took off for the diner about an hour ago."

Soap dries your skin, but

DOVE creams your skin while you wash

New bath and toilet bar is one-quarter cleansing cream.

BRAND-NEW FORMULA! DOVE is a completely new formula—DOVE creams your skin while you wash. No more of that dry feeling you get after using soap.

RAINWATER-MILD! DOVE has none of that harsh alkalinity of soap. You could wash with mild DOVE twenty times a day—no matter how sensitive your skin!

LATHERS IN HARD WATER! DOVE gives you rich lather, even in hard water. And never leaves a bathtub ring.

CLEANS BETTER THAN ANY SOAP. Better than any cream, any liquid cleanser. Lifts out every trace of grime or stale make-up! Leaves your skin so clean.

NEW SHAPE. DOVE is sculptured to fit your hand.

MORE CREAM THAN ANY SOAP. One-quarter of every bar of DOVE is rich cleansing cream.

Lever Brothers unconditionally guarantees you'll like DOVE for your face, your hands, all of you—or we'll give you back every penny you paid.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 98

mother's maiden name had been more than personal. It had been, in a dreadful way that she had always foreseen, intimate.

She spread her bathing suit out on the tiny patch of grass behind her cabin and carefully avoided looking at Mrs. Damon hanging out baby clothes on the little wooden rack that was the club's nearest concession to a clothesline. Rosemary Damon seemed scarcely more than a child herself, but it was obvious after even the briefest conversation with her that she had read every baby book ever published and took them all quite seriously. She was earnest and pretty and totally without humor.

Lou was turning back into her cabin when a voice sprang out of the lazy late-afternoon silence. "How is the baby, Mrs. Damon? Better, I hope?" Mrs. Gifford's voice, edged as usual and full of injury.

"Oh, she's fine, she just drank all her ——" Mrs. Damon's eager voice stopped short, and there was a silence that sounded as though she were flushing. "I think she's trying to get a tooth, that's why she's been crying at night. I hope she hasn't disturbed you ——"

"I'm a very light sleeper," said Mrs. Gifford, sounding somehow proud of it. "And in the country, of course, one expects —— Have you tried paregoric?"

No more rough, dry calloused skin · No more nylon snags

SPOTLIGHT'S ON Pretty Feet

Watch 'Pretty Feet' actually remove dry, dead skin in seconds.

on hands . . . elbows . . . on feet and legs!

Revolutionary new lotion acts at once to smooth and soften rough, dry, calloused feet!

Now you can rub away dry, dead top skin from your feet, soften callouses and heel bumps . . . and have the sleek, satin smooth feet you've always wanted.

Just smooth on Pretty Feet—and rub it off. Amazing new duo-dermal action actually erases flaky, dried-out top skin from rough heels, knees and hard callouses. You see your feet turning soft as a baby's. They feel re-born, too . . . soothed, refreshed as never before. And Pretty Feet perfumes and cleanses as it smooths. Contains no menthol. Safe for fragile nylons, sensitive skin. Erases rough, dry top skin from hands and elbows, too. Use Pretty Feet every day . . . and walk on air! Dunbar Laboratories, Wayne, New Jersey.

It's smart to have Pretty Feet WINTER AND SUMMER

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

At leading department and drug stores.

Meddling, Lou thought, going back into her cabin, and, now that she had her fought-for heater, looking for something else to complain about. The Giffords' cabin was on the far side of the drive, so that Mrs. Gifford couldn't hear the small-hours wailing nearly as clearly as Lou did. And a light did go on at once; Lou could imagine the grumbling of Mrs. Damon's black-browed husband.

Could it possibly be Mrs. Gifford who had called her?

She couldn't, Lou realized, judge voices by the way they sounded now or might have sounded over the telephone in Mrs. Heffernan's study. Mrs. Gifford, for instance: the woman ordinarily used her voice as a weapon, but how might it sound if she wanted to be pleasant and cajoling? What if Mrs. Damon were angry or frightened? The Sewards, in Cabin 3, were so mild and complaisant that they could hardly be said to have voices at all, but undoubtedly they did. And there had to come a time when Mr. Appleford was not playing games, and Mrs. Engstrand was not preserving her empresslike silence. If it came to that, there was Mrs. Engstrand's companion, Mrs. Ames, who was plainly what was called a lady in reduced circumstances, and there was Miss Lovett, who was staying at the clubhouse.

Miss Lovett was a plain and ruddy forty-five at least, dowdy and talkative and instantly likable. Lou, who automatically endowed people with backgrounds, gave her two old Beacon Hill aunts who would presently die and leave Miss Lovett a half million each.

One of them? Or, on an outside chance, one of the club's floating population of sunburned young women and men who came as guests of members to golf or play tennis or swim? The telephone call had come at five minutes of eleven, and the drifting golfers usually arrived after lunch. Greens fees had to be paid at the office, and no one had come to pay a greens fee. Still, Lou lifted the phone, heard Miss Patton's nasally lilting response, and asked for the golf shop.

Mr. Thurston, the golf pro, said that he had been in or about the shop all morning and nobody had come by who didn't belong there.

Which meant, as of the moment, the Sewards, the Applefords, Mrs. Gifford and her daughter, Miss Lovett, Mrs. Engstrand and her companion, the Damons, the two unidentified women in the lobby, and, on an unlikely perimeter, Dana Mallory and her cousin, Ingalls.

There was a possible way to narrow it down.

"Help?" said Miss Patton gratefully at eight o'clock that evening. "Well, if you're sure you don't mind. . . . The Smithwicks are coming in tonight. Max is down at the station now. They've got"—she picked a card out of the file on Lou's desk—"Room Eleven. If anybody wants the major, take a message; he isn't to be disturbed. I'll be in the kitchen."

The office was startlingly different at night. It had a holiday, work-is-over atmosphere. The switchboard was silent, the drawing room empty. Lou lifted the composition barrier and walked rapidly out through the lobby and up the stairs.

The bookkeeper's room was directly ahead of her, on the first landing. She had been interviewed here, in spite of the fact that her job was already assured, and spent the first day typing the roster of the club's membership. She had been introduced to last season's files, and remembered that to each card was clipped a duplicate of the season's charges.

She had the names ready in her mind: Appleford, Damon, Engstrand, Gifford, Lovett, Seward—and to be cold and scrupulous, Mallory.

The tenth of June, when Amy Heffernan had been kidnaped, wasn't important; whoever had been behind Veuchen would have been very careful about just that date. But the ransom money had been delivered on June twelfth, and if all these people had been here at that time, mightn't there have been a long-distance telephone call, duly recorded on the charge?

Startlingly close to Lou, over the distant sounds of a table-tennis game, a door came lazily open. A woman's voice said, "But you can't be sure, Mrs. E."

"Don't be more of a fool than you can help," said a sharp answering voice. "She answered the telephone there, didn't she? And listened in half the time, I dare say. We'll be in a pretty pickle if —— Would you be good enough to close the door, Mrs. Ames, if you can possibly spare the time from your nails?"

Mrs. E. Benevolent old Mrs. Engstrand, with her several chins and lazy turtle-green eyes and endless loops and tangles of beads on her massive bosom, who had a whiplike voice in private. Lou's skin prickled faintly. The door closed and there was nothing more to hear. It was then ten minutes of nine.

"How do I look?" said Dana Mallory, pivoting for the inspection of Ingalls and Miss Rockett. She wore gray chiffon, cool and still as water until she moved and the chiffon broke into floating movement. Her dark hair shone. She didn't use rouge, and her lipstick looked defiantly bright against her too-white skin.

"Fine," said Ingalls falsely, and in the same breath Miss Rockett said bluntly, "Not so hot."

Dana turned her mouth down. "My nightly fling," she said. "One watery highball up at the clubhouse, and I really believe you two would do me out of it if you could. Poor Sam, you're getting fed up with nursemaiding, aren't you? Never mind, John will be home the day after tomorrow."

Any man worthy of the name is only too willing to make a fool of himself for the sake of a woman.

FRANK RICHARDSON

She picked up her handbag, and Ingalls rose. Miss Rockett said briskly, "Not so fast," and handed her a small glass of orange juice. "Your drops."

Dana drank the orange juice and shuddered, handing back the empty glass. "They were all at the bottom. Well, I'll be back in an hour or so. How's Richard?"

"Asleep," said Miss Rockett economically. She had come home from the hospital with Dana after Richard's birth, and she was that rare thing, an unsentimental baby nurse. She didn't like Dana's transparent pallor, and she exchanged a worried shake of the head with Ingalls as she stood aside at the door.

The night was oppressively hot, holding its breath before the rain. Dana had got used to walking slowly; Ingalls had to remind himself to match his pace to hers.

Halfway to the clubhouse they met Lou Fabian. Ingalls recognized her before Dana did. They all halted fleetingly. Dana said, "Miss Fabian, do they work you day and night?" and Lou Fabian shook her head and smiled dimly. "I don't know whether you've met my cousin ——"

Lou said crisply, "Yes, I have. Hello, Mr. Ingalls. It's going to pour, isn't it?" and then they were going in different directions.

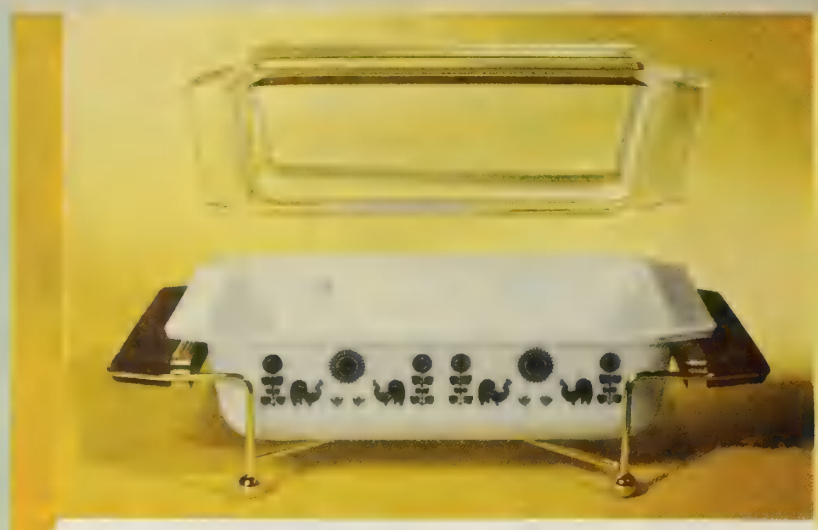
It was certainly going to rain, Ingalls thought. His inexorable imagination presented him with Dana soaked to the skin, doctors shaking their heads. He said gloomily as the terrace lights washed out to meet them, "I'm going back to get you a coat. I'll see you in the bar."

It was Ruth Ann Gifford, suitably enough, who found the body in the woods.

Mrs. Gifford had instructed her daughter well in the privileges that go with money. At thirteen, Ruth Ann was a replica of her mother, with a precocious arrogance behind her broad white face and bored dark eyes, but she had a further weapon, a gift for mimicry. She could limp like Bert, the oldest of the clubhouse waiters. She could tremble and clutch her braids like the terrified maid Mrs. Gifford had dismissed for some imagined sin.

At eight o'clock on that rainy morning, Ruth Ann told her mother that she was going bird-watching. She then set out on her own private diversion, which was spying on the cabins from the woods.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 103



YOU'LL FIND THE NORCROSS AMERICAN BEAUTY ROSE ON CARDS FOR ALL OCCASIONS AT THE BETTER GREETING CARD SHOPS AND DEPARTMENT STORES EVERYWHERE. ©NORCROSS, INC.

new PYREX® Honeymoon-House gifts

Modern Pyrex ware is beautiful on the table, practical in the kitchen

New PYREX Space Saver Casserole. Perfect bridal gift. Beautiful bake-and-serve casserole. Cork handles. Brass-plated cradle. Clear Pyrex cover is extra serving dish or table-protecting tile. 2 qt. $5.95

New PYREX Decorator Casserole. Another wonderful Pyrex gift idea. Modern oval, bake-and-serve casserole in charcoal on yellow. Brass-plated cradle. Clear Pyrex cover. 1½ qt. $3.95

New PYREX Carafes. Ideal wedding or shower gifts. Make instant coffee, tea or hot chocolate easily—serve all beverages, hot or cold, beautifully. Available with or without warmers. $2.95 to $9.95

New PYREX Cinderella Bowls. Mix, store, bake or serve in the same beautiful bowl that's a joy to work with because it has pouring spout and handle. Set of 4 bowls, in pink, turquoise, or yellow. $4.95

New PYREX Chip-and-Dip Set. Ideal gift for any hostess. Brass-plated holder keeps small dip bowl in place above larger bowl that holds potato chips or crackers. White on turquoise. $3.95

There's only one PYREX® ware, a product of Corning Glass Works, Corning, New York

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 100

She hardly knew herself what she expected to find. She was prepared to say, if Mr. Ingalls so much as looked at her, that he had asked her into the pink house and tried to give her a drink, but Mr. Ingalls couldn't seem to tell her apart from a tree. The Sewards were too old to be interesting, and Mr. Appleford so friendly that there was no sport there. She speculated about Miss Fabian. Mrs. Gifford had said charitably, "Dear, Miss Fabian is attractive in her way, and she's quite fortunate to be working among nice people. The thing is that most people have to work for a living, and it's what they're best at."

Ruth Ann had tried to reconcile this with Miss Fabian's cool and piercing eye, and couldn't; that was why she always gave that cabin a special inspection.

There was nothing to see this morning. The curtains hung still, the doors stayed closed. Things might be better at the Damons', and she started there, keeping cautiously inside the line of trees. Her rubbers went down on the spongy pine-needled ground, a fallen branch, and then, because she was watching ahead for a vantage point, something that gave unpleasantly underfoot.

A hand, the fingers spread gropingly. Attached to that, an arm. Ruth Ann said, "I beg your——" and then she screamed like any thirteen-year-old and spun and slipped and ran screaming away.

Lou showered and dressed hastily, because she had overslept. She walked up the drive, crossed the wet terrace and let herself into the lobby. She went on into the empty dining room, asked Bert for tomato juice and coffee. At eight-thirty she entered the office.

Miss Patton was at the switchboard. She said, "Good morning, Mrs. Gifford," and appeared to listen blankly. "Bird-watching, did you say? . . . Are you sure?" Miss Patton was demanding intensely. "Yes, I'll call right away." She severed the connection. Then, while Lou stood staring at her, she rang Major Soames.

Someone on the stairs said, "What a foul day. I wonder if the mail is in yet?" and Lou moved toward the barrier, instinctively guarding it. Behind her Miss Patton, back turned and head bent, said into the cupped receiver, "—— the Gifford child, just a few minutes ago. . . . From the description, I'm afraid there's no doubt. . . . Apparently behind Miss Fabian's cabin."

"What a day," said Mr. Appleford zestfully at the barrier. He looked wet and exhilarated. "Mail in yet?"

"It'll be in about nine," said Lou, tautly aware of the silence behind her, and Mr. Appleford sauntered off.

Miss Patton said in a flat low voice, "There's a dead woman in the woods behind your cabin. Ruth Ann Gifford found her a little while ago."

She went rapidly into the supply room and emerged in a raincoat. "Where's Max? Don't breathe a word of this until you have to, Miss Fabian; it'll be all over the club soon enough. There's a police lieutenant on his way and I'm meeting him at your cabin. Tell the major"—she was through the barrier flap now—"that I've gone down, and get hold of Max. He'll have to drive the major down, it's pouring."

There might have been more; if there was Lou missed it. After her first shocked realization, there wasn't time to think. The switchboard bristled with calls: Miss Lovett wanting the time, the Sewards inquiring innocently about their heater, Mrs. Engstrand demanding room service. Max called; Lou told him he was needed to drive the major.

Major Soames came down immediately after that. Presently the station wagon drove up through the rain and he departed.

People came and went in the lobby; apart from a slight impatience over the delay of the mail and the morning papers, the tempo of the club was unchanged. At about nine-thirty Miss Patton came striding through the lobby and into the office. She looked pale and her blue eyes were shadowed, but because a little group of women had gathered near the barrier she merely nodded at Lou and said that Max was waiting. Lou put on her own raincoat and went out and got into the station wagon.

"They want you to look at her," Max said.

The police car was pulled up in the grass-grown driveway beside the cabin. As Lou got out of the station wagon a uniformed officer appeared on the porch. "Miss Fabian? I'm Lieutenant Corey. If you'll come this way——"

It wasn't a long walk. The lieutenant entered the woods and did some polite holding back of branches. Then he was saying, "I'm sure you understand that this is necessary, Miss Fabian. Do you know this woman, or have you seen her before?"

Lou looked; like Ruth Ann, she was astonished at having come upon violence so suddenly. She said instantly, "No, lieutenant."

A number of people—photographers? other policemen?—had been here very recently; there were squashy heel prints beginning to fill with water. They had turned the dead woman on her back. Her body was a thin girl's and her face a bitter, knowing child's. Black hair lay about it in soaked points. Brows and lashes were only a little darker than the crescents of weariness under the closed eyes.

Lou turned away. The lieutenant said, "Are you sure, Miss Fabian?"

"Positive." The individual features weren't startling, the bitterness was. "Who is she?"

The lieutenant shrugged. "Nobody, yet. She doesn't look like a member of the club?"

The gray chambray dress, cut by the tens of thousands, the white beads at throat and wrist, the pin on the shoulder, the black sandals already beginning to come apart in the rain—— Lou said troubledly, "No. I don't think so."

"Somebody looking for a job, maybe?"

MARK SHAW

the well-fed Bridegroom

STUART

Way to a husband's heart: spicy chili, crisp tossed salad, oven-hot bread, fruit.

Margaret Williams, whose first book is a cookbook, The Well-Fed Bridegroom (Doubleday and Company, Inc., Garden City, N.Y.), was born in New York City. She now lives in New Orleans, runs a gift shop, helps cater Mardi Gras balls and, in addition, manages to keep her own large home running smoothly.

© 1957 by Margaret Williams

By MARGARET WILLIAMS

What's a bride to do if she can't cook? And what is a new homemaker going to do if she thinks she can cook, but knows she needs some expert advice on the subject? Here's one thing both can do: plan a meal like this one, relatively quick and easy, and then rest assured that theirs are truly well-fed bridegrooms.

The essential know-hows of the kitchen which the experienced cook takes for granted—and often forgets to explain to the greenhorn—are explained in this meal plan. Just follow the steps, then set before your husband a meal hearty and handsome.

Quick Chili
Hot French Bread
Spinach-and-Cauliflower Salad
Apple-and-Cheese Board
Coffee

This chili you can make in little over half an hour. Furthermore, it cooks by itself so that you'll have plenty of time to get on with your meal preparations. No need to hurry.

FOR THIS MEAL YOU'LL NEED: 1 pound lean ground beef, 1 green pepper, 1 No. 303 can kidney beans, 1 No. 2 can tomatoes, cumin seed, lettuce, cauliflower, 1 carrot, 1 pound fresh spinach, ½ cup slivered almonds, 1 loaf French bread, fresh fruits—apples, bananas, or your own favorites—and an assortment of the cheeses you like.

YOU SHOULD HAVE ON HAND: Butter or margarine, onions, garlic, chili powder, bay leaves, salt, cayenne pepper, salad dressing (the kind your husband likes best) and coffee.

TO PREPARE THE MEAL:

1. For the Quick Chili, ask your butcher to grind 1 pound lean beef. You don't have to have the best, but if it's to be really lean, ask for top or bottom round.

Quick Chili: Melt 2 tablespoons butter or margarine (and bacon drippings are especially good) in a Dutch-oven-type kettle over a low heat. Chop 1 large onion, mince 1 clove garlic and shred (that means the thinnest "sticks" possible) 1 green pepper. (Cut the pepper in half lengthwise, remove veins and seeds, and shred the pepper the long way, not in rings.) Sauté the onions, garlic and green pepper gently for 10 minutes. Onions and garlic can burn easily, so give them an occasional stirring. Don't let them brown. Now add the ground meat and brown for about 1 minute (this doesn't mean dark brown). Add the contents of a No. 303 can kidney beans, drained, and lower the heat. In another pan, mix together 2½ tablespoons chili powder and ¼ cup cold water. Stir in 1 cup drained, canned tomatoes (save the juice for a breakfast beverage). Season with 1 bay leaf, crumbled, 1½ teaspoons salt, ½ teaspoon cumin seed and a dash of cayenne pepper. Bring to a boil and then pour the mixture over the meat and beans. Cover closely and simmer on top of the range for 30 minutes. Serve in individual bowls. Makes 2 ample servings (and enough for seconds too).

2. While the chili simmers, toast a few slivered almonds (about ½ cup) on a baking tin in a slow oven, 300° F. Watch the nuts carefully and stir them frequently. They'll be golden and crunchy in 15 to 20 minutes.

3. Here's a green salad with a new combination of tossings. To be sure that it's perfect, see that it is crisp-fresh. No good salad looks handled, just lightly tossed with a good dressing—and at the last minute.

Spinach-and-Cauliflower Salad: Wash well 1 pound fresh spinach and remove stems. Crisp in ice water along with ½ head lettuce, broken up into bite-sized pieces. Using a vegetable peeler, peel 1 carrot, then shave off slivers into the ice water. Wash 1 small cauliflower head well, break off and slice enough flowerlets to make ⅔ cup. Crisp. Just before serving time, drain the vegetables well. Break up spinach leaves and toss together with other vegetables in a large bowl. Top with your favorite dressing and toss again, lightly. Sprinkle with ½ cup toasted almond slivers. Makes 2 to 4 servings.

4. Just as you're beginning the salad, the French bread, sliced to—and not through—the bottom crust, should go into a moderate, 350° F., oven. Plain or garlic-buttered before it's heated, French bread is perfect for a chili dinner. Keep an eye on the oven, though, when the bread's in. It warms quickly.

5. It's time now to put the coffee on. Then it will be steamy-fresh when you're ready to serve the dessert course.

AND NOW FOR DESSERT: A cheese board combining the sharp and bland cheeses (hickory-smoked Cheddar and Gruyère, Roquefort and Camembert, Swiss and mild Cheddar). You choose the combination. Then add an apple—or other fruits in season. What a simple and satisfying way to round out the chili dinner.

Inexpensive and uncomplicated, the meal comes colorfully to the table, a happy combination for a hungry groom.

She said, "I'm afraid I can't help you there, that wouldn't be in my department. If that's all?"

Before the lieutenant could answer, a voice behind Lou said, "This is Mr. Ingalls, sir. Pink house, on the way in."

"How do you do, Mr. Ingalls?" said Lieutenant Corey pleasantly, and introduced himself. "Ever seen this woman before?"

Ingalls walked silently into Lou's vision and looked down. "No, I've never seen her before, lieutenant."

Lou walked away. She met the Sewards being shepherded by the patrolman. The Sewards barely grazed her mind, because she was still full of astonishment at the thing the lieutenant, busy giving orders, apparently hadn't seen. It was hardly definable—a too-steady gaze? a tensing of the muscles beside his mouth?

Ingalls knew perfectly well who the dead woman was.

There was no sign of Max and the station wagon. Lou started back at a fast walk that broke into a little run now and then. She was shocked and shaken. It was going to begin all over again now, the police, the newspapers, the unmasking—because that was what it would look like—of Louise Royce. The sensible thing to do would be to return immediately and tell the lieutenant herself, before anyone else could. Still, suppose someone was already confessing to the killing—that happened, not often but sometimes.

The sound of her name called was like an authoritative tap on the shoulder. Lou stopped reluctantly and turned to watch Ingalls walking rapidly toward her. He said with a startling casualness, "Dana seems to have picked up a cold last night. She's in bed today. She asked me to ask if you'd drop in and see her this afternoon if you have time."

Could that really be why he had called her name in that sharp urgent way? Lou said stiffly, "I'd like to."

Ingalls said rapidly, "If I were you, I'd go over the cabin before the police do."

Lou felt herself color incredulously. "Why?"

"Call it a hunch," Ingalls said. Then, in a tired, patient voice, "Or don't search the cabin. Either way."

The sudden indifference was stinging. But then, Lou thought, he was altogether a different man than he had been yesterday; older, colder, his face tight and bleak. Lou said rashly, "You recognized her, didn't you?"

Ingalls said with a deadly politeness, "No, I didn't. Did you?"

Major Soames, plunged into gloomy rage by the unorthodox goings-on in his woods, had reckoned without his guests. When Lou reached the clubhouse the lobby and drawing room were full of a mild, pleasurable excitement.

The club's publicity woman had been summoned and was established at the desk in the far corner of the office. The switchboard was rattling. A Bridgeport newspaper was on the line and Lou gave the call to the publicity woman, who presently introduced herself as Jane McNamara. It rattled again to announce Mrs. Gifford, insisting that Ruth Ann's name be kept out of the newspapers. Lou said that everything possible was being done to keep publicity at a minimum, and hung up to find Jane McNamara regarding her with amusement.

"Same old lovable bunch," the publicity woman observed dryly. "How's Mrs. Engstrand—been climbing any curtains lately?"

Lou registered that with a mild shock. "I didn't know she climbed curtains. I've only been here two weeks."

No man can justly censure or condemn another, because indeed no man truly knows another.

SIR THOMAS BROWNE

"I thought you looked rather new and unbruised," said Miss McNamara, surveying her critically. "She's mad as a March hare, if you ask me, but she can afford a companion instead of a keeper. Well, it's an ill wind. The publicity ought to be good for Old Mother Kildoon."

Lou's fingers went still on menu paper and carbon. "Who?"

"Mrs. Seward," said Jane McNamara, eying her curiously. "Don't you listen to soap operas? Mrs. Seward used to be Old Mother Kildoon, Young Mrs. Kildoon's Understanding Mother-in-law, until the sponsor ordered her written out of the script. She used to be quite a trouper, they say, although you'd never know it to look at her."

Sandy, middle-aged Mrs. Seward, looking like something on a pancake-mix label. And, in a far-off echo, Maude Heffernan saying to her husband, "Harmon dear, surely you can do something about that poor woman on the Kildoon program? After all, you're a member of the board."

Lou's skin prickled, as it had the night before. The files had told her that the Giffords and the Sewards and the Applefords had been at the club last year during the week of June tenth. And in the telephone charge book were the carbons of three New York and New Jersey telephone calls on June twelfth, when the ransom for Amy Heffernan had been paid.

The numbers were on a slip of paper in Lou's pocketbook, and the exchanges equally etched in her mind: Algonquin, Longacre, Trenton Fields. In all probability, the calls were as casual as they seemed to be.

Still, wouldn't Veuchen's shadowy instructor have been anxious to learn whether or not the ransom money had been collected as arranged?

The persistent image in Lou's mind for over a year had been the flower-rimmed window in Mrs. Heffernan's study, the quiet sunlit grass, the baby carriage. Now, in a transparent overlay, there was the face of the dead woman in the woods.

Orange and coconut — Jell-O® gelatin dessert cubes — Gumdrop flowers — Chocolate swirls Light as a bubble...and bubbling over with dessert ideas!

So fluffy . . . a bubbly-light dessert with creamy goodness that always satisfies. Easy to digest, never heavy.

So versatile . . . makes a whole cookbook of exciting new desserts—just add your favorite fruit or flavoring! Thrifty, too—36 individual servings in every box.

So good for you . . . made with fresh eggs-n-milk, yet not loaded with calories. See new quick recipe on box. Serve tapioca tonight!

TODAY'S QUICK-AND-EASY MINUTE TAPIOCA

Works magic, too, in fruit pie fillings!

Use tapioca instead of cornstarch or flour thickeners. Tapioca bubbles burst in oven heat—give a juicy consistency that's never "runny." Never clouds fruit flavor or color! Recipe on box.

A fine product of General Foods

The club station wagon drove up in a spurt of gravel and deposited the Applefords, Mr. Appleford looking unwontedly pale and his wife completely unruffled. It took a small delegation to convince Mrs. Engstrand that it was necessary for her to view the body, but eventually a voluminous raincoat was produced and she was zippered and buttoned and tied into it as carefully as though she were being sent somewhere by parcel post. Miss Lovett, already raincoated, regarded the procedure with interest. Mrs. Ames clutched a sweater about her shoulders and the convoy moved out to the waiting station wagon.

Would any of them recognize the woman in the woods—or, recognizing her, admit it?

Lou plugged in an outside line, asked the operator for long distance, and took the slip of paper from her purse. She started with the Longacre number, making out a charge slip meticulously while she waited. Miss Patton had put this call through for Mrs. Seward on June twelfth last year.

A female voice answered the faraway phone. Lou said at random, "Is Mrs. Brisbie there?"

"Who?" The voice sounded elderly and a trifle deaf. "You have the wrong number, young woman. This is the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Seward."

Had she really expected anything else from the mild, kindly Sewards? Without waiting for the charge operator's automatic call back, Lou started on the Algonquin exchange. That was the Applefords, also on June twelfth.

A child answered. No, the Applefords were not home. They would be in Connecticut for another two weeks. Was there any message?

Lou realized all at once that she was proving nothing at all. If one of these people had been in touch with Veuchen, it would have been prearranged, and the message relayed, perhaps unknowingly, by an intermediary.

She didn't know exactly when she became aware that someone had been watching her. She closed the charge book as though it had burned her and turned to face Ingalls at the barrier. He was blank and polite as a stranger. He said, "Is the mail in yet?"

"No ——" Foolishly, Lou blundered into explanations. Max had been ferrying people between the clubhouse and the woods and hadn't gone into town yet.

Ingalls cut her off with a remote nod. "Shall I tell Mrs. Mallory you'll be in to see her this afternoon?"

Not "Dana" or "my cousin" as before. Lou flushed very faintly. She said evenly, "Yes, Mr. Ingalls. Just as soon as I've searched my cabin."

She did that, grimly, at a quarter after four, shifting cushions and pulling open drawers, certain, from Ingalls' manner, that there was something to find. Even with all that preparation she was somehow astounded at the gun in the linen cupboard.

It was a very small gun. It looked, if anything, all the more deadly for the fact of being in miniature.

But the woman in the woods had not been shot. She had been struck with something, on the back of the head.

Lou tucked a towel back into place around the gun. She hadn't touched it; she had been very careful not to. After a moment of staring blankly at the closed cupboard door she went back into the living room and opened the telephone directory.

The police would have to know about the gun, and the fact that she was Louise Royce; not to tell them would be like walking into clearly charted quicksand. Lou lifted the telephone, gave the number of the police station.

Lieutenant Corey wasn't there. Lou made herself ask when he would be back, was told in about an hour, and left a message that she had called. Then she showered, changed into a thin cool silk dress, put on her raincoat and went to see Dana Mallory.

The tall nurse met her at the door of the pink house and conducted her silently to Mrs. Mallory's first-floor bedroom. Disapproval surrounded her like a cloud, and Lou, who hadn't wanted to come in the first place, felt herself growing edged and a little angry.

Dana Mallory herself, propped against pillows under a green satin puff, was warm and apologetic and talkative. "It was awfully kind of you to come—do you mind if I call you Lou?—and such a horrible day, I thought we might cheer each other up. Don't come too close, I've got a deadly cold. I certainly didn't do very well by you, did I? Out of the frying pan into the fire."

It took Lou a moment to realize that the other woman was talking about the murder in the woods, and a further moment to wonder why she had put it in just that way.

"I mean ——" said Dana Mallory, and broke off as the nurse came purposefully into the room. "Not again, Miss Rockett?"

"Again," said the nurse brusquely. She crossed to the bureau, took a thermometer from its bath, shook and read it, and advanced on the bed. "You've had pneumonia twice, remember? You've got a baby to think about now, so let's be on the safe side. And such a night as I put in with you, coughing your head off ——"

Dana Mallory opened her mouth obediently; she said, just before the thermometer went in, "What do they think about all this up at the clubhouse?"

The room had been lighted against the dripping afternoon, and apple blossoms came softly to life on the walls. The tufted rugs were pale pink, dressing-table skirt and draperies matched the wallpaper in fresh polished chintz. It was a protected room for a protected woman, and Lou, looking at the white expectant face against the pillows, kept her account light.

The first reports of the murder, she said, had had Ruth Ann Gifford struck down while bird-watching, and an unidentified voice from the bar had been heard to mumble, "Terrible thing to say about a kid, but she was sure asking for it." No one knew who the dead woman was, although there was a theory that she was a maid from one of the summer places.

Dana Mallory crooked her dark brows at that, in what might have been disbelief, and the nurse advanced and took out the thermometer. She read it, and handed it silently back.

"A hundred and two? That's not so much," said Dana, but she sounded faintly alarmed. "What about the baby, Miss Rockett? Do you think I ought to call Doctor Crandon in New York, just in case ——"

"The baby's fine," said Miss Rockett crisply, "and sleeping like an angel. What you need, Mrs. Mallory, is aspirin and fluids and rest."

She looked hard at Lou as she said it, and Lou registered the message. There was something about the dead woman that Dana mustn't know. A shadow moved in the doorway. From the bed, Dana said, "Sam, dear—with news, I hope? But first make Lou—Miss Fabian—a drink."

"I really can't ——" began Lou, and was cut off immediately by Dana Mallory's "Of course you can," and Ingalls' "Scotch or rye?"

Lou said, "Scotch then, please," and thought that the nurse's face relented a little in understanding. Ingalls went away and came back with two glasses.

The nurse disappeared. Dana said to Ingalls, "Don't keep us in suspense like this; what have they found out?"

"Not very much," said Ingalls. He was sitting in a green slipper chair and plainly finding it inadequate. "They recovered the woman's pocketbook, and there's nothing in it to say who she was. It looks as though somebody hit her too hard, and then made a clean sweep. Probably a petty crook who never had a thought of killing her."

His face, Lou thought, looked bored and idle. From her bed Dana couldn't see the hand that gripped the underside of the slipper chair, the knuckles showing white.

Dana Mallory said, "But you haven't told me anything—was she young, for instance? Pretty?"

Lou said, "Well, young," and was made to remember the face against the sodden moss. With that very dark hair and clear pale skin, the dead woman had probably had brown

HYDROX loves parties! Has for fifty years...ever since Sunshine first merged richest chocolate wafers and creamiest vanilla filling into one festive treat.

The ORIGINAL cream-filled chocolate cookie, for fifty years the finest made!

HYDROX at a party...as a party...every bite's a celebration!

eyes. It all depended on the eyes, because faces with the lids down lost nine tenths of their identity.

She hadn't answered the other part of Dana's question, but neither of them seemed to notice. Lou put down her drink and stood up firmly to say good-by, and was dismayed when Ingalls insisted on accompanying her to the door.

The nurse was nowhere to be seen. Ingalls went with Lou through the tiny flowery hall and out onto the grass between shielding cedars. He said abruptly, "Did you ——" and Lou said, "—— search my cabin? Yes, I did. There's a gun."

"A gun?" Ingalls looked surprised. "What did you do with it?"

"I didn't do anything with it. I called Lieutenant Corey, but he wasn't there. He will be in about fifteen minutes."

"In that case"—Ingalls was very casual—"do you mind if I have a look at it first?"

There was nothing to say to that, even if Ingalls had been waiting for an answer. He wasn't. He walked silently beside her through the soft and now-invisible drift of rain. She led the way up the cabin steps and he waited attentively while she unlocked the door. Inside Lou could feel him looking at everything in a curiously reconnoitering way. She opened the door to the linen cupboard, and he was at her shoulder when she lifted the tucked-under folds of towel.

"Well, well," he said softly, and reached in and picked up the gun. He examined it for what seemed to Lou an interminable time.

But surely, Lou thought, the police should be doing all this? She said involuntarily, "Should you ——" and Ingalls glanced up abstractedly. "You certainly don't think anybody put this in here with fingerprints on it, when the point was to implicate you? Which," he said thoughtfully, "it will."

"Oddly enough," said Lou edgily, "I had thought of that. Still, under the circumstances I've got to ——"

"Why?" asked Ingalls simply. "Theoretically only two people know anything about this gun—you, and whoever put it here. If you don't go to the police about it, how can he? He might suggest that they search your cabin, but he can't very well be surprised if they don't find a gun which has nothing to do with the case anyway."

Hasn't it? thought Lou. She said nothing, partly out of indecision, partly because of the peculiar tension that was suddenly present.

Ingalls said softly, "Look. The police have a dead woman on their hands and they don't even know who she is. They'll find out in a day or two—they have ways—but in the meantime they have to have something to tell the newspapers. You'd make pretty good copy with a gun you can't explain."

In the living room, as though it had been stage-managed, the telephone rang. Lou turned instinctively toward the telephone and then checked herself; she said, "Why don't you want the police to know about the gun, really?"

"Oh, because I'm so chivalrous," said Ingalls, watching her tensely. "Won't that wash, for the time being?"

His eyes were imploring. Lou walked away and picked up the receiver. "I have a message that you called," said Lieutenant Corey's voice. "Is there something we can do for you, Miss Fabian?"

"Well, I . . . wondered if you'd found out who the woman is," said Lou, but try as she would she couldn't make it sound like a valid reason for having the lieutenant return her call. She added, "With the woods and everything, I can't help feeling nervous about tonight."

"We're working on the identification," said Lieutenant Corey, sounding as though his attention were already elsewhere, "and I've told Major Soames we'd have a man in the grounds tonight. If that's all ——"

Lou hung up, feeling ignominious. Ingalls had come quietly close. His hand dropped as she turned; had he been going to touch her shoulder? He said abruptly, "I've got to get back. Can I owe you a drink?"

And an explanation; his tone implied it. But Lou resented the exact price for what she had just done, and she shook her head.

"You can't be bribed, is that it?" said Ingalls, and his flicker of amusement only emphasized the underlying bleakness. He stared at the gun in his hand. "This ——" Something seemed to check him sharply. He lifted his dark head again, said briefly, "Thanks," and walked to the door and was gone.

With the gun in his pocket.

There was no use rationalizing what she had done; it was irrevocable. Lou wandered nervously around the cabin. Had she stood just here, perhaps, while not twenty yards away ——

A sudden urgent tap at the door flooded her with panic. It was Rosemary Damon, who had come shyly and apologetically to drop her bomb.

It was now Thursday. Early on the preceding Tuesday evening, the dead woman had been seen emerging from the back of Lou's cabin.

Rosemary Damon, round blue eyes anxious, explained at length. She had taken Betsy out in her carriage and when she got home the silver rattle that dangled from a string tied to the carriage hood was missing. Her husband had been in New York that day, and when he returned she went out again to look for the rattle. She had retraced her steps as far as the pine-needled path bordering the golf course above and behind the woods when she met Mr. Thurston, the pro. They were standing there talking when, distantly visible, the woman appeared at the door of Lou's cabin.

"Of course we paid no attention—I thought it was you," said Mrs. Damon. "But then, after I saw her this morning, I remembered about the pin."

Pin? Lou's mind was blank and stupid with shock; slowly, laboriously it translated what this earnest girl in pink-and-white-striped cotton was saying. Pin, yes; a novelty-shop rooster contrived out of glass and tin, fastened to one shoulder of the soaked gray chambray dress.

"My husband," said Rosemary Damon confidentially, "said that I'd have to tell the police, but you've been so nice that I wanted to tell you first. Would you have a safety pin, by any chance? I told him I came over to borrow one."

Going to look for the safety pin, and clinging to the detachment, Lou felt amused at and a little sorry for Mrs. Damon, who had to placate her husband with such excuses and was very faintly proud of it.

She found a safety pin and gave it to Rosemary Damon, who stood up in a crisp rustle of skirts and went to the door. She paused to say curiously, "Do you suppose she was a thief? Looking for jewelry or loose cash in the first cabin she came to?"

It was true, Lou thought, that a stranger couldn't have known that one of the cabins was occupied by a club employee. She said to Rosemary Damon, "I have no idea, but thank you for letting me know," and then, with a vast effort, "How is Betsy; has she got her tooth yet?"

"It just came through," said Rosemary Damon, smiling. "Shall I bring her over some afternoon when you're not busy?"

"Do," said Lou. "Did you ever find the rattle, by the way?"

She might have imagined the very faint sharpening of the round eyes. "Mr. Thurston was practically standing on it," said Mrs. Damon, and went down the steps and disappeared.

What could the dead woman possibly have wanted here? The telephone rang while Lou was trying to remember whether she had locked her cabin when she went up to the clubhouse for dinner the night before last. It was Miss Patton, tired and cajoling. "If you haven't any other plans, could you give me an hour or two after you have your dinner, Miss Fabian? I wouldn't ask, but I'm about to tuck straws in my hair."

The emotional temperature at the clubhouse had changed sharply. A number of things made the evening difficult. Mrs. Severn, one of the two talkative women in the lobby, grew weepily drunk on Major Soames' shoulder. Mrs. Gifford called up to say that if Ruth Ann's name appeared in the newspapers she would sue; whom she would sue was not made clear. Major Soames managed to shake off Mrs. Severn, who went damp-eyed into the drawing room and melted on Miss Lovett's shoulder.

Miss Patton was holding the fort in the bar. With her were the Applefords, Mrs. Engstrand, Mrs. Ames, and the confused and bewildered Smithwicks. For all their surface assurance, these people were nervous.

"Coastline Club," said Lou mechanically at the switchboard, and connected an outside call to the Mallory house. The Sewards' light flashed a second later: could they expect police protection tonight? Lou repeated what Lieutenant Corey had told her, and hung up.

"Miss Fabian," said Major Soames, and Lou jumped slightly. She hadn't heard him come in the back door of the office, followed by Albert, the chef, and Oleg, the plump blond headwaiter. "You can help us by taking some notes, Miss Fabian."

At first glance, settling at his massive glass-topped desk, the major looked benign—except for his eyes. A wedding reception had already been canceled. While Albert and Oleg stood at uneasy attention and Lou waited with her pencil poised, Major Soames said, "We'll have—let me see now—we'll have a Hawaiian night. Eh?"

Albert and Oleg nodded disjointedly. "Plan it for next Saturday night. We'll have a luau, set up tables outside. Lots of rice," said the major firmly to Albert, "and . . . sliced pineapple You know the kind of thing."

Albert, who had weathered Mardi Gras and Riviera nights, gazed hopelessly out the windows. Oleg, who was new, looked consciously intelligent.

"We'll decorate with grasses, palms. Leis for the women. Go easy on the gardenias; you can consult Miss Patton or Miss Fabian about all that. Miss Fabian."

Lou jumped again uncontrollably.

"Take this down," said Major Soames pleasurably. "Aloha there—the Coastline Club takes pleasure ——"

Albert and Oleg melted away. Lou took a number of notes and a memorandum for Jane McNamara, and kept thinking all the time about the dead woman's inexplicable visit to her cabin—and the gun. The gun had a different aspect now.

Major Soames yawned, consulted his watch, said good night and sauntered out into the lobby. Lou was surprised to find that it was only a little after eleven o'clock. There was a murmur of voices in the lobby, and then Miss Patton appeared at the barrier, exhaustedly pale in the yellow light that gilded her hair and threw shadows under her eyes. "You're an angel," she said, "and I promise you this won't happen again. Leave a note that Max is to drive the major into New York in the morning, will you? To see about hula dancers. And then tell Max to drive you home, you must be ——" She didn't say "dead." She nodded at Lou and turned away, and a moment later her ascending footsteps were swallowed up in silence.

In a twinkling, everything was different.

Max must have been somewhere in the kitchen regions, but his presence did not impinge on the sleepbound, almost spellbound quality of the clubhouse at this hour of the rainy night. Her typewriter would clatter like

CONTINUED ON PAGE 108

NEXT MONTH

YOU CAN BEGIN THE NOVEL EVERYONE WILL TALK ABOUT

"Women and Thomas Harrow," by John P. Marquand, is a man's-eye view of three marriages and the women who were important in the life of a famous 54-year-old playwright. "When you first saw a girl you loved she created an impression that nothing could ever change." First of five parts.

MEN BUY JEWELS WORTH MILLIONS FOR THE WOMEN THEY LOVE

Thirty-six women in the United States own jewels worth at least $1,000,000. Among them a single pearl costing $50,000; a 130-carat diamond pendant: the largest sapphire in the world. Most were "gifts from men who loved the women who wear them." Laura Date Riley describes the gems and their owners, "America's Most Fabulous Jewels and the Women Who Wear Them."

"I HATE BEING PREGNANT AND I HATE SEX . . ."

She is 27 years old, mother of three children. "Husbands have all the privileges, wives have all the obligations," says this young wife, blaming her husband for every unhappiness. Dr. Clifford Adams discusses symptoms and help for those "Totally Unready for Marriage."

IF YOU'VE EVER FALLEN OFF A DIET, LISTEN TO HELEN FRALEY

Mrs. Fraley, who once weighed 295 pounds, slimmed to a glamorous 135. Then, alas, she regained 110. Now, in 10 months, she has lost 100 pounds and attained the 145 her doctor approves. Dawn Crowell Norman tells how in "Hurray for Helen!"

YES, THERE'S A NEW SILHOUETTE IN SUMMER FASHIONS

The prettiest evening dresses at parties ahead will be fragilely lovely—as unexpectedly different as a violet chiffon with a balloon skirt . . . the trapeze look in white organdy, embroidered with topaz-yellow roses . . . or American Beauty taffeta with Empire waistline and small, pointed train. Color photographs and five pages of fashion news.

WHO PUT THE BB SHOT IN THE GARBAGE DISPOSER?

The JOURNAL homemaking staff has been calling on housewives to find out how they keep their household equipment in good working order. How long should a range or washer give service? What should you do when the repairman won't come? Margaret Davidson gives the answers in "Breakdown—Woman at Work."

Also a complete novelette: five "Enchanting Bedrooms," including Mr. and Mrs. Gower Champion's: the menu and recipes for a "Patio Party"; Dr. Spock's page for mothers, and many, many other features, all coming

IN THE JULY JOURNAL

NEW IDEA! Add flavor to your favorite foods with KRAFT Jellies and Preserves!

Use them as ingredients to add true flavor of fresh-picked fruit, captured the special KRAFT way!

New Kraft Jellies and Preserves are the ones to use —because they're made to be extra flavorful. Even when Grandma made her wonderful jelly, much of the good fruit flavor boiled away. But Kraft makes jellies and preserves a new, flavor-saving way. They're "cool-cooked" . . . at temperatures 'way below boiling . . . to keep the flavor and color of the fresh-picked fruit! Doesn't using new Kraft Jellies and Preserves as ingredients sound delicious, and easy? They come in all your favorite varieties.

PEACH MELBA For each serving, place a scoop of ice cream on a drained canned peach half. Spoon Kraft Pure Seedless Black Raspberry Preserves over the ice cream.

Wonderful for serving at graduation parties, showers for brides-to-be, and for other occasions.

PINK PARTY CAKE Prepare 1 package white cake mix as directed on package, adding ⅔ cup Kraft Pure Strawberry Preserves with the first addition of liquid. Pour into a greased and floured 13 x 9 x 2 inch pan. Bake according to package directions. Frost with Strawberry "Philly" Frosting.

STRAWBERRY "PHILLY" FROSTING Place one 3-ounce package Philadelphia Brand Cream Cheese in a bowl, and cream it until soft and smooth. Add 2½ cups sifted confectioners' sugar, blending it in well. Add ¼ cup Kraft Pure Strawberry Preserves and mix again.

BLACKBERRY ELEGANCE For each serving, place a scoop of ice cream in a meringue shell. Spoon Kraft Pure Blackberry or Red Raspberry Preserves over the ice cream.

TEA TIME TREAT Spread slices of white bread with Parkay Margarine and cut in half, some diagonally, some lengthwise. Spread half of the pieces with deviled ham, half with Kraft Pure Apple Jelly.

FREE RECIPE FOLDER!

Here are many ways to add fruit flavor to baked goods, desserts, main dishes. Write to Kraft Jellies and Preserves, Dept. J6, Box 522, Chicago 77, Illinois.

No Sugar to Add!
PEACH CUSTARD PIE made with Eagle Brand

Creamy Peach Custard Pie

1 unbaked 9-inch pastry shell
⅔ cup (½ 15-oz. can) Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk
2 cups hot water
3 eggs, slightly beaten
½ teaspoon salt • 1 teaspoon vanilla
Nutmeg • 9 peach halves, fresh or canned

1. Combine Eagle Brand Milk and hot water. Only Eagle Brand has the sweetening pre-cooked in it to give you extra-rich smoothness.
2. Stir gradually into eggs. Stir in salt and vanilla extract.
3. Pour mixture into unbaked pastry shell. Sprinkle top with nutmeg.
4. Bake in hot oven (425° F.) 20 minutes. Reduce oven heat to 325° F. and bake 15 to 20 minutes longer, or until knife inserted in center of pie comes out clean. Cool. Garnish top with peach halves. Eagle Brand makes desserts so smooth!

FREE!
Get Elsie's 28-page, full-color Recipe Book

© The Borden Co.

The Borden Company
Dept. LHJ-68, Box 171
New York 46, N. Y.
Please send me Elsie's Free book, "70 Magic Recipes."
Name_____
Street_____
City_____ State_____
This offer good only in U.S.A.

Borden's Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk
Good in coffee—and on cereal, too!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 106

a machine gun in this silence and Lou was reluctant to touch it; still, her shorthand was not of a caliber to endure overnight, and she bent her head to her notes. "Bananas"—had Major Soames really said something about bananas? She typed it tentatively, and finished the rest of the notes. She had been listening unconsciously for Max's jangling approach, and she heard the harsh catch of her own breath when a voice out of nowhere said quietly, "Miss Fabian."

Lou's chair spun back with a little crash as she stood up.

"Sorry if I startled you," said Ingalls. He was leaning against the barrier. "Would you know where that call to the house came from, at about nine o'clock?"

Lou looked automatically at the switchboard. She said, pinning down a memory, "It came through on one of the outside lines."

"Outside," repeated Ingalls. His gaze went narrow. "How"—he jerked his head in the direction of the alcove under the stairs—"does the phone in that booth work? What would happen if I dialed the club from there?"

"It's a different number," said Lou. "It would show up on the switchboard as an outside call."

She didn't ask why, and Ingalls didn't appear to notice that she hadn't. He said softly, "All right, then. Who ——" and the back door of the office opened and Max stumped in.

He was taken aback at the sight of Ingalls. He said stiffly, "I thought everybody was gone," and turned to Lou, elaborately excluding Ingalls. "Ready? I'll drive you over."

Lou put her typed notes in her desk and snapped off her light. Ingalls said pleasantly, "Mind giving me a lift?" and Max grunted. When Lou emerged from the supply room with her raincoat they were both waiting in the lobby.

Max sent a final combing glance around the office and switched off the overhead light. The lobby was already dark. He said gruffly, "All set," and they went out into the rain.

The station wagon was parked at the foot of the terrace steps. They got into it in a silence that lasted all the way down the drive. Lou, sitting between the two men, felt like a hostage.

The cabins on this side of the drive were all dark. At Lou's cabin Ingalls got out and held the door.

"I'll wait," said Max.

"Don't bother, I'll walk," said Ingalls.

Lou intervened. "It's all right, Max, thank you. Oh, you're to drive Major Soames into New York in the morning. I left a note in the basket."

Max gloomily drove off.

With Ingalls beside her, Lou walked up the steps of her cabin and used her key. If Mrs. Gifford could see this, she thought disconnectedly—but even Mrs. Gifford would be aware that there was no frivolity about this midnight visit.

"I've got to trust you," said Ingalls abruptly. "You really didn't recognize that woman, did you? She was Veuchen's wife."

Veuchen's ——

Lou's fingers stopped on a raincoat button. She didn't know whether she had repeated the name aloud or whether the echo was in her own brain. Veuchen, and the fire, and the empty baby carriage on the shadow-drifted lawn —— She went on staring at Ingalls, trying to reject what her shocked and pounding heart knew he was going to tell her.

"That call tonight was instructions for me," said Ingalls. "Richard Mallory was kidnaped last night. He's been gone for twenty-six hours."

Lou took her hands away from her face and lifted her head, her eyes mutely inquiring. Ingalls said in the same taut, quiet voice, "Dana doesn't know yet. We've got her thinking she's sick and might infect Richard. Miss Rockett keeps the thermometer in warm water instead of alcohol—well, you saw." He rubbed his forehead. "It might not kill Dana, but her husband ought to be here when she finds out. He's due in New York tomorrow morning, he ought to be here before noon. I'll have instructions about the money by then; I'm to go to the post office at ten o'clock. In the meantime," said Ingalls grimly, "I'm doing exactly as I've been told. So is Miss Rockett—and we've been warned to keep the police out of it."

The kidnaping had taken place, he said, at about ten o'clock the night before. Any bystander could have set his watch by Dana's nightly visit to the clubhouse; she went up at nine, and was back before eleven. Last night Ingalls had returned for her raincoat, and when the nurse heard someone outside the house at close to ten o'clock she had assumed that they were back early. When no one used a key, or even knocked, she opened the door, called out inquiringly, and then took a step outside. Something had struck her from behind, but she had felt arms catching her. Nearly blacked out, she had heard the close sound of a car's motor. She had regained consciousness on the floor of the little hall inside and had fumbled her way upstairs to find the baby's crib empty except for a note.

The note had said to destroy it at once and to inform no one if they wanted the child back. Miss Rockett, dizzied, had copied the note and then destroyed it; she told Ingalls later that she hadn't dared not to, even in the empty house. She had then dressed the cut on

SUDDENLY IN SUMMER

By BARBARA SHOOK

Suddenly in summer,
First love song is spun,
Light as children's laughter
And August-slanting sun.
Its kiss will live long after Wiser loves are won.

her head, wound a turban around it, and sat up to wait until Dana Mallory was safely in bed and she could get to Ingalls.

Rain spattered against the cabin windows in a sudden shift of wind. Ingalls said steadily, "That's why the police mustn't know about that gun. It'll be traceable, in one way or another. I think it belonged to Veuchen, and that his wife was out on her own private man hunt, and that's why the gun was planted on you. Because if you'd been in the Heffernan business with Veuchen, and his wife found proof of it after he was executed ——"

"She might have come after me, and I might have killed her," said Lou. She was beyond anger or surprise or even fear. "Yes, I see that."

"But then you wouldn't have given me the gun," said Ingalls, smiling very faintly at her mildness. "You might have hidden it as though it had been planted, but you wouldn't have let me walk off with it. And you wouldn't have placed those telephone calls from the office."

So he had been listening.

He said quietly, "They may identify the woman at any time. There's nothing we can do about that. But the gun —— Once the name Veuchen is out, the lid is off. The kidnaper panics ——"

Like Veuchen, who hadn't liked hearing Amy Heffernan cry. Lou shrank tightly and defensively away from that, and Ingalls, on his way to the door, looked down at her "Somebody's got to pick up the ransom money, maybe tomorrow night, maybe the next. You're in a position to know who's where, and when."

Of course that was why he had had to take her into his confidence. Lou said woodenly, "Are you sure you trust me?"

"Trust you?" said Ingalls with the first violence she had seen in him. "I'm trusting you with Dana's baby!"

Lou went to bed as soon as he had left. She realized, with rain pattering on the window sill and a cool draft of air brushing through the dark, that she had forgotten to tell Ingalls that Mrs. Veuchen had been seen leaving her cabin, and she had neglected to ask what the voice, giving instructions over the phone tonight, had been like. But then she knew what it had been like—a whisper, harsh, carrying, sexless.

What had Ingalls implied? That Veuchen's wife might have found proof of collusion, and taken his gun and come up here to make her own reckoning with whoever it was who had persuaded him into the Heffernan kidnaping, collected half the ransom money and gone scot-free. But she had been reckoned with instead; she had been bludgeoned into permanent silence.

That must have been on Tuesday evening. And the next night—because plans had gone too far to be called off now?—her killer had gone boldly through with the kidnaping of Richard Mallory.

Lou stared at darkness. She thought quite clearly that she would have to start remembering—now, this minute—every word, every phrase, every telephone caller at the Heffernan house. There was the sun-and-shadowed study, the telephone on the edge of her desk, and then, as though she had taken a bludgeoning of her own, there was sleep.

"Dishwasher," repeated Lieutenant Corey into the telephone at nine the next morning. His hand wrote the facts on the pad before him. "Joseph . . . Pavlow. Fired on Tuesday afternoon, after a drunken quarrel with a pot washer. Last address 261 Atlantic Avenue. Thank you, Miss Patton, we'll look into it."

Lieutenant Corey took out the preliminary autopsy findings that had reached him that morning. The woman had been dead for at least twenty-four hours, possibly thirty-six. The murder weapon was the usual blunt instrument, probably a rock, although they might be able to narrow that down. She had evidently been taken by surprise, as there were no indications that she had struggled with her assailant. The only other mark of interest on the body was an abrasion on the third finger of the left hand, as though her killer had tried to remove the band of gold lace there.

It had since been removed by fingers with more time than the killer had had. It was an unusual ring, possibly designed to order, and initials or a date inside had been filed off. A description of the ring had been sent out through the usual channels.

Robbery with violence, Corey thought with remote disappointment. The time of death fitted in with darkness sometime during Tuesday night and the woman might well have been mistaken for a guest, worth robbing. The would-be thief could have had no way of knowing that the dead woman had carried her money crushed haphazardly into a side compartment of the purse, twenty-three dollars and eighty-one cents in all.

There was no actual proof of a wallet, but it was hard to believe that any woman traveled around completely without identification. In the lieutenant's mind there were three possibilities: the woman had chosen to be anonymous for reasons of her own; her killer had snatched out the hypothetical wallet hastily, in the dark, made an attempt at the ring and found himself later with only a handful of identifying papers; the identification had been removed deliberately, and the ring wrenched at for the same reason.

Lieutenant Corey already knew, from a telephone call late the preceding afternoon, how the woman had arrived at the Coastline Club. A driver for Breen's Taxi had picked her up at the six-o'clock train from New York Tuesday afternoon. She had carried neither gloves nor luggage of any kind, and she was hatless.

She had seemed flustered when she hailed the taxi—"kind of . . . I dunno," said the driver baffledly, and it was clear that any sharper definition would stay locked forever in his brain. Part way up the club drive she had stopped him, paid, and got out. As he drove away she was still standing there, poking about in her purse.

The woman wasn't, after a check with Missing Persons, anyone on their list. Neither had

CONTINUED ON PAGE 110

CLING PEACH-MATES

CLING PEACHES LOOK SHIP-SHAPE, GO GREAT WITH SO MANY FOODS! FOR INSTANCE, LAUNCH THESE FAVORITES—AND WATCH FOLKS SAIL INTO 'EM!

CLING PEACHES 'N' CEREAL

CLING PEACHES 'N' ICE CREAM

GRILLED CLING PEACHES 'N' BURGERS

CLING PEACHES 'N' PUDDING

CLING PEACHES 'N' CAKE

CLING PEACHES 'N' COTTAGE CHEESE

CLING PEACHES 'N' GELATIN

GRILLED CLING PEACHES 'N' CHICKEN

Get an order blank at your grocer (or print name and address on back of label.) Send with 50¢ in coin to: Cling Peaches, Box 49, San Francisco 1, Calif. Offer expires August 31, 1958. Offer not valid where prohibited, taxed or license fees required.

SUNNIEST WAY TO BRIGHTEN ANY MEAL · CANNED CLING PEACHES FROM CALIFORNIA · CLING PEACH ADVISORY BOARD

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 108

she been registered at the Hotel Standish or any of the larger guesthouses.

Lieutenant Corey pocketed the address Miss Patton had given him and was on his way out of the office when his telephone rang. It was a Mr. Charles Damon at the club, to say that his wife and Mr. Thurston, the golf pro, had seen the dead woman emerging from the cabin next to theirs early Tuesday evening. . . . Yes, that was Miss Fabian's cabin. . . . Damon, whom the lieutenant remembered as a dark-haired and rather surly man, sounded stubborn, as though someone had tried to talk him out of making this call.

Miss Fabian would be the girl in the office. Lieutenant Corey wrote down names, thanked Damon, said he would be at the club later that morning, and left the office to go and see the dishwasher who had been thrust so opportunely into the case.

Joseph Pavlow, jarred out of a peaceful and alcoholic sleep in the shabby rooming house on Atlantic Avenue, was instantly familiar to Corey. Pavlow, who worked where and when he felt like it, was picked up routinely on charges of drunkenness and disturbing the peace.

Pavlow admitted that he had been fired on Tuesday for getting drunk and quarreling with a pot washer. "I take a little nip now and then, for my liver," he said. "And then this pot washer—now, there's a real stinker. Ever meet him, lieutenant?"

Lieutenant Corey said frostily that he had not. He said sharply, "All right, you left the club drunk and you got even drunker. Do you remember meeting a woman when you went back?"

The cunning elision of circumstances escaped Pavlow at first. He said gropingly, "No, I don't remember no ——" and then, with instinctive fright, "Who says I went back?"

"The pot washer says you threatened to come back and settle with him. A woman was killed in the grounds on Tuesday night. Somebody tried to rob her, and bungled the job."

Pavlow's eyes were no longer wistful, but full of a helpless panic. "I swear I didn't —— Look, I know I got a record but I'd never ——"

Would I? his eyes begged pleadingly of himself, but there was only a blank to answer him, a number of hours that his brain couldn't account for. Corey, knowing that, said crisply, "Better get yourself cleaned up," and Pavlow looked wretchedly around the untidy room, located a razor, and went obediently out and up the hall.

Corey searched the room, quickly and competently. He found nothing, as he had expected, but he could not ignore, he never ignored, the other side of every coin. The neat smiling housewife who made a neat little hell for her family, the pitiful young girl who pleaded rape and made a profitable business out of it. The beguiling drunk, whose blood chemistry might have changed for just a twinkling.

And besides, there were the newspapers.

Lieutenant Corey took Pavlow in, and heard with displeasure Sergeant Ennis' jovial greeting. Then he started for the Coastline Club.

Just as he left the town on his way out to the club, he passed a man walking rapidly along the tree-lined road. Something about his height or stride, or the fleeting glimpse of his face, was newly familiar. Lieutenant Corey looked into the rear-view mirror.

Mr. Ingalls, he thought, the wealthy Mrs. Mallory's cousin, and drove on.

Ingalls walked rapidly because action of any kind helped to slacken the tautness inside him. He was going to the post office, nothing more; he was deliberately not looking one inch beyond where he had been told to look. Rebellion could very easily result in the death of Dana's baby.

Dana had been pettish and difficult this morning, in spite of the false thermometer reading. "You go in and out of here," she had said indignantly to Miss Rockett, "and you must be absolutely crawling with germs. I don't see why I couldn't just hold Richard for a while. I'm perfectly willing to wear a mask."

"We're going to have to tell her," Miss Rockett said grimly to Ingalls, "or get a doctor and have him put her in the hospital for a couple of days."

Ingalls seriously considered taking a doctor into their confidence; telling Dana that her child had been kidnaped was her husband's decision, and John Mallory would be there in two hours. Women traditionally weathered shocks that would kill men, but Dana had suffered two coronary attacks and there were no statistics to go by there.

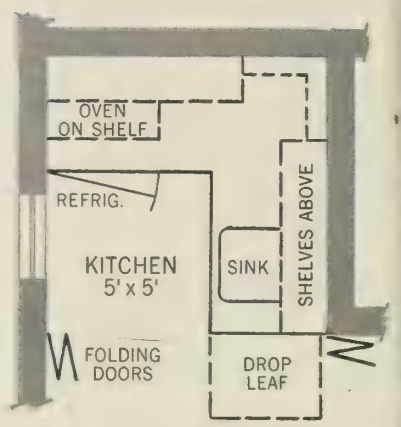
Ingalls got rid of three extra minutes by examining the posters at the local theater, and it was ten o'clock when he entered the little red-brick post office as instructed.

At one of the two grilled windows a woman in a bright print dress was dispatching a package—up the Yalu River, Ingalls thought presently, by the time she was taking. He waited, growing stiff with irritation. The transaction was eventually complete. Ingalls approached the window, where the clerk was shutting the money drawer and pushing the scales aside, and said casually, "Anything for Ingalls?"

The clerk looked at him. "Got a box here?" he asked.

"No."

"I'll check," said the clerk doubtfully, and went off into the back regions. He returned presently with an envelope, reading its address aloud: "'Mr. S. Ingalls, town. Please hold until called for.' That be it?"



"That's it. Thanks very much," said Ingalls, and took the envelope and walked out of the post office.

Open it here and now, in the sunlight and random traffic? Something close to superstition warned him against it, but by that time he had absorbed all that the envelope could tell him. Cheap paper, the address typewritten. The postmark was local, and the stamp had been canceled at four P.M. yesterday.

The tension in Ingalls was too strong to listen to reason or unreason. He held the envelope up and tore off one end.

Just 5'x5'

By MARGARET DAVIDSON
Homemaking Editor

STUART

For using plug-ins, generous counter is added to by 18″ drop leaf. Refrigerator is new and space-saving, takes only 24″, fits snug in corner under counter. Sink is stainless, has single-handled faucet. Between refrigerator and sink is base cabinet with turnabout shelves.

Though there are many little closet kitchens, few function as delightfully as this one does. It has a flair for the dramatic—does its work without a range, using only portable appliances.

Look first at how little housework there is to it. You stand, center of the room, and pivot to an undercounter refrigerator on your left, sink on your right, shelves on both sides. And up on Cloud 9 is the skyhook, a clover-leaf fixture holding any small aid you want to find at hand—an easy reach for a 5′ 2½″ wife but it clears the head of her 6′3″ spouse. Underfoot is a blue-black floor in vinyl tile, in 6″ squares to key with the kitchen's small scale.

A blue plastic counter, 6′ long in all, stretches on to include a drop leaf at the sink. The broiler-oven has its own sliding shelf at eye level, so counter below it is always free. Cabinets are limited, but one in the corner is a rotary model made with $5 worth of hardware. Inexpensive open shelves are more than handy; tableware is prettily displayed. Staples and spices meet the eye, but food in packages is stored behind sliding doors made of thrifty pressed wood.

The big helpers here are the appliances. A broiler-rotisserie bakes too; an electric saucepan makes full dinners; an electric fry pan is temperature controlled—and together they price-tag at about the cost of a small range. Teamed with an electric percolator (or teakettle or hotcup) and toaster, they do almost anything from snack to party dinner in a kitchen too small for a range. They need 120-volt outlets with plenty of power for appliances, not just for lighting. But three-wire circuits are not needed.

Shutter doors close off the kitchen as you go to the dining area. Graceful chairs, marble table, party dishware wait fresh as a garden. And all the kitchen aids go automatically on at work while you dine—and are close at hand for encores.

Small—but the ideas work just as well in big kitchens.

Tires suddenly swished to a stop beside m, a voice called out, "Give you a lift, Mr.
galls?"
It took Ingalls a blind moment to identify e voice as Max's, and the station wagon as e Coastline Club's. Mrs. Seward sat with ax in the front seat, and there was someone se in the back.
Mustn't look odd, Ingalls thought rapidly.
his was new, too, the watchdogging of every sture. Jason Appleford, who occupied the st rear seat with Ruth Ann Gifford, opened e door hospitably. Ingalls said, "Thanks ry much," and climbed in.
Max drove with bored and practiced ease, he red-furred hand on the wheel, the other trailing down from the elbow cocked at his window. Appleford caressed a canister of tennis balls; Ruth Ann Gifford licked lazily at a pair of ice-cream cones, strawberry and vanilla, her meager tan pony tail bobbing. Mrs. Seward, after a smiling greeting for Ingalls, watched the road as intently as though she were driving.

They were halfway to the club when Miss Patton's voice, nasal and bright, said, "Good morning, Coastline Club."

There was a moment of shocked silence. Max's short thick-fingered hand went tight on the wheel, Appleford burst out laughing, Mrs. Seward turned to Ruth Ann Gifford: "But that's remarkable!"

Ruth Ann tossed her head a little, and a large drop of vanilla ice cream rolled down Mrs. Seward's neck. Mrs. Seward reached up patiently and wiped it away. "I could be on the radio, I guess," said Ruth Ann carelessly, "but nobody listens to the radio any more."

Mrs. Seward's smiling profile didn't alter by a hair, although she said gently, "Well, hardly ever." Her own voice was remarkable, thought Ingalls; she had the actress' trick of aiming it, so that with no increase of volume it went where it was intended.

"Do me," said Appleford invitingly, and Ruth Ann turned and inspected him at length. "I could if I wanted to," she said finally, "but mother says it isn't tactful."

Mr. Appleford darted sharply after a spray of strawberry ice cream on his immaculate pale gray knee. Mrs. Seward murmured, "Mother is so right."

Max sent the station wagon splashing through the shadows on the driveway and drew to a stop at the pink house. Ingalls thanked him and got out, and the station wagon drove off. When the sound of the motor had died Ingalls was alone in the sunlight. He took the letter from his pocket and unfolded the single sheet of paper. His fingers and even his glance were clumsy with haste, so that at first he raked in random words that jumped falsely and senselessly together. It was his brain that needed steadying, and it obeyed him just as the door of the house behind him opened with an urgent sound.

The body of type fell away, leaving the words that mattered in the sieve of Ingalls' straining attention, ". . . $100,000 . . . tomorrow night . . ."

The sound of the opening door came tardily into Ingalls' consciousness. He pocketed the letter before he turned.

"You'd better get in here right away," said Miss Rockett. Her capable face looked helplessly frightened. She gestured with her head at the silent house. "She knows," said Miss Rockett simply.

Lieutenant Corey came thoughtfully away from his interview with Thurston. He had learned something; exactly how much remained to be seen.

The golf pro had little to add to Mr. Damon's bare statement over the phone. A man in his late forties, attired in flannels and an open-necked shirt that showed just the right amount of wear, he had an expensively weathered look.

Lieutenant Corey found him on the small practice tee behind the golf shop, where a large motherly looking woman was trying out what was obviously her first set of clubs. As the lieutenant approached, she planted her feet sternly, arranged her elbows, addressed the ball as though it might explode, and finally swung. Thurston watched with a kind of fearful fascination. The club descended jarringly a few inches away from the ball and another ragged clump of earth sailed off to join its fellows.

"Head down, Mrs. Vence," suggested Thurston politely. "You can't very well keep your eye on the ball when you're looking to see where it will go, can you? Excuse me a minute ——"

Mrs. Vence continued to tear up the practice tee. Thurston, who had not been at the club the day before because of the rain, studied the mercilessly clear photo Corey showed him and nodded; it was, he thought, the woman he had seen coming out of the secretary's cabin. Not that he had actually seen her emerging from the back door—it was motion glimpsed from the tail of his eye while he was talking to Mrs. Damon—but he had thought at the time that it was Miss Fabian. "Who was she, lieutenant?"

"We don't know yet." Corey had watched the brown face as the golf pro examined the photograph, and found nothing there but curiosity. "Where did she go from there, Mr. Thurston?"

Thurston shook his head. He had been talking to Mrs. Damon and at the same time casting an eye over the near greens; the lieutenant would be surprised at how often total strangers got onto the course. Why, only the other day ——

Mrs. Charles Damon was evidently not so civic-minded as her husband; although her story was only a barren repetition of Thurston's she looked stiff and inimical, as though she resented telling even that much. Seated in one of the cane chairs on the cabin porch, she shook her head when the lieutenant asked her about the woman's further movements. "I only saw her for a second, and that was because of the light on that pin she was wearing."

He asked Mrs. Damon if she had noticed any of the golfers on the near course that day, and she wrinkled her forehead thoughtfully. "Mr. and Mrs. Seward. Miss Lovett, I think. And ——" She frowned a little and shook her head. "Nobody else that I remember."

a plug-in Kitchen

Cooks full meals without a range.

a Trio of Automatic Cooks

Broiler-rotisserie has added to its talents—bakes beautiful cakes as well as roasts, and grills steaks and chops.

Curtains, glass-fibered, now have the feel of fabric but never see an iron—they drip dry.
White metal furniture rubbed with brown gives a driftwood color in restful mood.
Victorian walnut serving chest stores mats, napkins and silver.

Electric fry pan cooks vegetables or meats, and is a case of dialing the temperature to suit.

Saucepan cooks by wire too. The large size handles meal-in-a-dish foods ably. Control is removable so pan can be immersed for washing.

It sounded doubtful; Corey waited a minute and, when she shook her head again, stood up. "On your way back here, Mrs. Damon, do you recall meeting anyone who wasn't a member of the club?"

He didn't specify a man, and a man obviously the worse for wear; he was being scrupulously fair to Joseph Pavlow. Rosemary Damon looked up at him with her round blue eyes. She said hesitantly, "If I did—would that mean ——"

"We're checking all possibilities," said Corey pleasantly.

"I did meet a man," said Rosemary Damon slowly, "but he was more funny than anything else; I mean you could see that he was quite tight. Not in an ugly way at all. He seemed to be a workman or something."

Pavlow.

Robbery with unpremeditated violence, after all? A pocketbook swinging invitingly from a wrist, the dishwasher thinking that a guest in this place wouldn't really feel the loss of whatever cash the pocketbook contained? Pavlow had no record for violence, which would make him all the more panicky at a scuffle, the beginnings of a scream ——

This passed like a crackle of lightning through Lieutenant Corey's mind. Mrs. Damon, queried as to whether she would recognize the man again, said that she thought she would. Corey asked if she would be available a little later on, and went back to the clubhouse to talk to Miss Fabian.

She stood at the barrier talking to a ruddy-faced woman in a dark silk dress. She was smiling, but in spite of the smile she looked tenser than yesterday. Her glance at the door made the other woman turn, and Lieutenant Corey found himself facing an animated Miss Lovett.

"Did you want me, lieutenant? No? Oh dear, that's disappointing. I've always wanted to see how the police work. I don't know what I could tell you, frankly, but I would if I could."

Lieutenant Corey thanked her politely. He wondered, as she strolled off down the hall, what there was about her that gave the impression of solid wealth. He said to the girl who had remained at the barrier, "There are one or two questions, Miss Fabian. Is there somewhere we could talk without being interrupted?"

"Just a second," said Lou Fabian, and went to the switchboard, plugged in a line and pulled back a key. She said, "Is Miss Patton busy? Would you ask her to come into the office, Bert?"

Three minutes later, following her through the empty drawing room, heading for the television alcove as Miss Patton had suggested, Lieutenant Corey took automatic stock of his temporary quarry. In her middle twenties, a little on the thin side, wearing a slender dress that looked like black-and-white tweed but was cotton on closer inspection. Something about the straightness of her walk suggested a good background, just as the wide silver bracelets on both wrists —— Corey pulled up the years-old memory: a young girl who had attempted suicide by slashing her wrists, and wore bracelets later. Not so expensive as this very thin chased silver, but similarly covering.

Lou Fabian sat down in a cherry-colored chair and looked expectantly at the lieutenant. Yes, Mrs. Damon had told her about having seen the dead woman near the back of the cabin, and naturally she had looked at once to see if anything was missing. Nothing was—not that she had anything to tempt a thief. Had the police discovered the woman's identity?

Lieutenant Corey was irritated at having to say no for the third time that morning, and the irritation gave an edge to his voice. "She wasn't the person you were expecting, then?"

"I wasn't expecting anybody, lieutenant."

"You weren't? Then it was just an impression Mr. Thurston had," said Corey. "He had an idea, when you called him yesterday to find out if there had been any visitors at the golf shop, that you had someone specific in mind. He said you seemed quite anxious."

Lou had forgotten all about that call to the golf shop, made in the foolish hope of identifying her own caller. She felt her color change vulnerably.

"Oh, it's so silly." She managed an embarrassed smile. "There's a man I've been seeing quite a lot of, in New York, and he said he was going to come and look me up during his vacation. I thought if he got here in the afternoon, and didn't see me in the office, he might just have gone out looking for me. I hope this doesn't have to go any farther," said Lou primly, "because obviously he had no intention of coming and I'd look like a fool."

"I see," said Lieutenant Corey, and there was no telling whether he had swallowed that or not, but the interview was over and Lou was free.

Not really free. She went back to the office. Miss Patton rose thankfully, but her blue eyes narrowed a little. "What in the world did he want with you? They've arrested Pavlow—the dishwasher. He was drunk at the time, and furious about being fired. If Mr. Appleford wants his golf trophy, tell him it's at the engraver's." It was, Lou knew, up in Mrs. Engstrand's room with her birthday roses in it. "Mr. Mallory is due in today. Heaven send," said Miss Patton, casting her blue glance piously upward, "that he takes a taxi."

Lightening the boat, Lou thought detachedly, not listening to the last of that. Pavlow had been tossed overboard; she wo certainly be next. The switchboard buzzed she glanced at the orange light and plugge a line and lifted the receiver.

"Miss Fabian?" It was the pink-ho phone and it was Ingalls' voice. Without wa ing, there was another voice, dead and very close to the phone. "Call her by her name. Royce, Royce, Royce."

Dana Mallory's voice, like a lifted kr Lou gripped the edge of the switchboard pa with her free hand, and Ingalls' dim turn away voice said, "Dana, for God's sak Then with that same sharp quiet, "Is there way of meeting Mr. Mallory's train? It's in fifteen minutes."

Max—but Max had gone to drive Ma Soames to New York. In search of hula da ers. Lou said without further thought, "Y we'll meet it." She heard the start of sor thing, "How you can trust her ——" and that, gently, she hung up.

"Well, you'll have to go," said Miss Patt and plucked the station-wagon keys out of wire basket. She glanced at Lou. "What's matter, Miss Fabian? If you aren't well ——

"I'm all right," Lou said shortly, and to the keys and went out, through the din room and the kitchen, and down the woo back steps to the station wagon.

Only a handful of people got off the tra Lou's coldly sinking stomach identified Jo Mallory even before he recognized the stati wagon and started toward it.

He opened the door of the station wag glanced smilingly in, said, "Well, this is welcome sight," and got in beside her.

A welcome sight. And afterward he wo remember every glance, every syllable she tered. But she would have to say something only "Hello, Mr. Mallory," or "Was it hot New York?" Lou opened her mouth and dry tight throat betrayed her; only an ind tinguishable croak emerged.

"New York was like an oven," John Ma lory said kindly, covering up her croak. was almost professionally tactful. "I imagi the club's pretty busy?"

A woman murdered, his own child ki naped. . . . Lou, not wanting to go on reco with this of all questions, produced a mumbl sound that was open to any interpretation ar swung the station wagon out onto the road.

Let him think her surly, or self-conscio with men; the main thing was to get this i terval, every second of which was a betraya over. Mallory turned his head, seemed abo to speak, and didn't. A sudden sense of u gency brought Lou's foot down on the accele ator, and she sent the station wagon skimmi under the elms. The pink house was in sig when Mallory said in a thoughtful voic "Something's wrong. Isn't it?"

Lou said nothing, but the station wago gave a small startled leap. He said sharpl "It's—is it my wife?" and there at last, like painfully held breath expelled, was the pin house.

She realized that John Mallory was starin at her, waiting for her to answer. She brake so sharply that they both rocked forward little; she said helplessly, "I can't ——" an stopped, shaking her head. By that tim Mallory had the car door open and the slammed behind him.

And the pink-house door had opened, an Ingalls was coming out. Lou put the statio wagon into gear and swung away, not want ing to look at him again after that one flashin glance, because something inexplicable ha happened to her in the course of it. It wasn any pounding of pulses or, for that matter, an sudden physical awareness; it was a devastat ingly simple desire to get out of the car an go to Ingalls and—what an old-fashioned wor it was—comfort him.

The afternoon was keynoted for Lou b Ingalls' call for a taxi at twelve-thirty, les than an hour after John Mallory had reache the pink house. Ingalls was to have receive ransom instructions at ten o'clock, and sh knew from that one glance at his face that h had. One of them, probably John Mallory, would be going somewhere to raise the money

It was somehow incredible that the leisurel country-club routine proceeded as idly an

"Playful As All Outdoors." For an 8" x 10" color print of this photo by Chandoha, send 25¢ in coin and one Puss 'n Boots label to Cat Pictures, Dept. J-68, Box 6586, Chicago 77, Ill. Offer good only in U. S. A. Void where taxed or prohibited.

"My cat has never had a sick day -has never eaten any other food"

Life balance of whole fish makes Puss 'n Boots the ideal food for cats

To her letter, quoted above, Mrs. R. S. R. of New York City adds: "My cat is perfectly developed and beautifully furred, has never needed any vitamins or other supplements to her daily diet of Puss 'n Boots."

Puss 'n Boots whole fish formula benefits both cats and kittens. For research shows that whole fish has the ideal balance of life-giving nutrients and is nature's perfect cat food.

Puss 'n Boots supplies an abundance of proteins from the costly fish fillets, plus vitamins, minerals and the other nutrients cats of all ages need. Extra Vitamin B_1 is added for appetite and good digestion, plus tasty cereals for proper balance and all-round good nutrition.

Feed your cat Puss 'n Boots regularly...see the difference in his health, beauty and vigor!

CHECK YOUR CAT against these characteristics of healthy cats fed regularly on Puss 'n Boots:

GROWTH AND VIGOR from the high-quality proteins in Puss 'n Boots.
GOOD APPETITE from the extra Vitamin B_1 in Puss 'n Boots.
NORMAL REGULARITY from the selected cereals in Puss 'n Boots.
STRONG BONES from the calcium and phosphorus in Puss 'n Boots.
SILKY FUR from the natural oils and minerals in Puss 'n Boots.
LIVELY ENERGY from the all-round nutrition of Puss 'n Boots.

How the Natural Life Balance of WHOLE FISH is Retained in Puss 'n Boots COSTLY FILLETS, rich in essential, high-quality proteins. Usually reserved for human consumption, but retained in Puss 'n Boots.

LIVER AND GLANDS, for minerals and vitamins. Vital for health. Often extracted for medicinal use, but retained in Puss 'n Boots.

BONE STRUCTURE, for valuable calcium and phosphorus. Made soft, crumbly and digestible, and retained in Puss 'n Boots.

Coast Fisheries Division of the Quaker Oats Company, Chicago, Illinois

PUSS'n BOOTS

Quality makes it America's largest selling cat food

Packed in 8-oz. and 15-oz. sizes

nnily as though nothing at all had hap-ned. It was a little like being the only one a picnic who saw the tiger watching from e grass.

At four o'clock Lou left, and at about eight nutes after four she met Ingalls. He was iting in the driveway, not ten yards away m the pink house but screened from it by e trees.

"I'm sorry," said Ingalls abruptly. He mo-ned at the pink house with his head. "About ana."

("Call her by her own name," Dana had id in that harsh cold voice. "Royce, Royce, yce.") "It doesn't matter," Lou said, keep-g her eyes carefully away from his. "It's ly what anyone would think."

"Not anyone. Not I," said Ingalls; "but then 'm not a hysterical mother. . . . John's gone r the money."

Lou looked at him speechlessly.

"A hundred thousand," Ingalls said softly. He's in charge of a division at Paige, and he's t Dana's power of attorney. He'll get the oney from here and there. It's to be turned er at nine tomorrow night."

Ingalls' eyes were hard. "Somebody's got pick it up. Somebody won't be here tomor-w night at nine. If you were in the office we uld do a certain amount of eliminating—r later," he said, making the vague word olid. "In the meantime ——"

He broke off. Lou could see his attention go way from her. She stared at the golf course, ondering if he had been instructed to de-ver the money, not wanting to ask.

"Dana's right about one thing," said Ingalls ddenly. "You do know who he is. I mean ou know of him. You ust." He was gazing at er with full attention now. le said, "There's a cross ference somewhere. There as to be."

Lou had known it from he moment of the whisper ver the phone, but she had ever put it quite so clearly o herself. "Cross refer-nce" was exactly the hrase. Was there someone who, last sum-ner, had been only the flicker of a skirt, he back of a head, a hand holding a ocktail? Lou had worked at the Heffernan ouse for two months, and it seemed in-redible that someone intimate enough with he household to know that the Heffernans ould be in Connecticut on that particular hursday would not have obtruded himself on er consciousness during that time.

The phone, for instance, that she had an-wered sometimes when the maid was occu-ied. Lou's voice was not unlike Mrs. Heffer-an's, and occasionally a caller had said, "Maude, I wanted to ask you about ——" before Lou could interrupt.

Was that why she had been whispered at, because she knew what telephone transmis-ion did to this specific voice?

Last summer her father's death had over-shadowed everything else, and there was the offsetting factor that Veuchen had confessed o the kidnaping and abandoning of the baby. The police had been equally stopped by the completeness of Veuchen's confession, and by the fact that no motive for collusion, if there had been collusion, seemed to exist within the small, moderately wealthy circle of the Heffernans' close friends. As for acquaint-ances—clients at Harmon Heffernan's bank, people on a first-name basis who dropped in now and then—they were too numerous and random to begin to go into.

But who, Lou thought, quickening, could look so wealthy and secure as someone on the brink of financial ruin? She realized with sur-prise that she didn't know the first names of half the people here, nor what they did when they weren't vacationing. She could find those things in the files tonight; Miss Patton was grateful for the extra help and had stopped be-ing surprised when Lou turned up after dinner.

And when she did find out, some of Mrs. Heffernan's friendly chatter might fall into one small slot. If only it could happen before tomorrow night, because ransom money, once delivered, was no guaranty of anything at all.

"Yes," said Rosemary Damon unhappily after Pavlow had been returned to his cell. "But I hate to ——"

"You've identified him as having been in the club grounds at approximately seven o'clock on Tuesday night. Nothing more," said Lieu-tenant Corey. "Thank you for coming in, Mrs. Damon. Sergeant Ennis will drive you back."

There was as yet no fingerprint identifica-tion of the dead woman, nor had the teeth turned up anything. There was still the ring, so at odds with the cheap little glass-and-tin rooster pin; because it was the only distin-guishing factor they had to work with, Corey had widened the circulation of the ring's description.

At five o'clock that afternoon the ring was identified.

The report came in from Boston. The ring had been stolen two years previously from Mrs. Gillis McGivern, of Marblehead Neck. It had been made by a Boston jeweler; the en-graving inside had consisted of the McGiverns' initials with a tiny heart between.

Marblehead Neck. Lieutenant Corey placed a long-distance call with his usual deliberation.

The chief of police in Marblehead was dis-appointingly brief. Mrs. McGivern was a widow, in her fifties. No investigation of the theft had been made at the time because Mrs. McGivern herself had insisted that the whole affair be dropped. She was going abroad to join a daughter, and she did not want to be pursued across the ocean by inquiries concern-ing a ring. She had evidently decided to stay abroad, because the house on the Neck had been sold a year ago.

Lieutenant Corey said sharply into the phone, "What about the servants? You'd have a record of their names?"

It seemed that they had not. "The housekeeper, though, hold on a minute," said the distant voice in Marblehead, and Lieuten-ant Corey listened tensely to a confused jumble in the background. The police chief came back on. "Housekeeper was a Mrs. Stavely. She's running a rest home or something down near you—Bridge-port. She'd be able to tell you about the others."

At a little after six-thirty, Lieutenant Corey walked up the wide wooden steps of the Pine-dale Rest Home, on the outskirts of Bridgeport.

The pines were few and scraggy, the house itself an ugly peeling white although, Corey knew, all such places took in a surprising amount of money. A clatter of silver and china from somewhere behind open windows in-formed him that he had arrived at Pinedale's dinner hour.

The woman who answered his ring was ob-viously Mrs. Stavely herself; no one else could have worn her air of authority and impor-tance. She was a small, thin woman, heavily rouged, with ruby-colored hair in bangs above little black eyes that snapped with shrewdness. She was about sixty. Corey, introducing him-self, had the uncomfortable impression that the bangs and rouge had been adopted for this new position in life, in an effort to create an appearance of amiability.

Mrs. Stavely, full of curiosity, ushered him into her sitting room. She remembered at once about the affair of the ring, because the maid, Jenny Harris, in tears at being suspected of theft, had promptly resigned and gone back to Nova Scotia. "I always thought," said Mrs. Stavely, "that it was the chauffeur, and that's why Mrs. McGivern dropped the whole busi-ness. She never could resist a handsome face."

The mild spite with which she delivered this commentary colored the rest of her account. The chauffeur had been hired on a temporary basis to drive Mrs. McGivern in the evenings; she normally drove herself but was suffering from an attack of bursitis.

The chauffeur had been driving Mrs. Mc-Givern for about two weeks when, a day or so after she had worn it last, Mrs. McGivern found the ring missing. The chauffeur had been in her bedroom on at least one occasion, when he had carried up a suitcase. She had a

I have no technical and no university education, and have just had to pick up a few things as I went along.

WINSTON CHURCHILL

Shown above: SERENE

REAL CHINA designed for America's new Carefree way of life for only 5.95

5-piece place setting

- GUARANTEED AGAINST BREAKING*
- OVEN-PROOF
- DISHWASHER-PROOF
- COPPER COVERED SERVING PIECES

Not plastic, not pottery. Carefree is the real thing... beautiful, durable, inexpensive china that won't stain, that washes clean without special precautions. Carefree won't warp or buckle and is so heat-proof you can actually cook in it. Sturdy enough for day-in and day-out young family use. Yet Carefree has the lovely look and feel of true china, which it is!

Carefree ALL PURPOSE TRUE CHINA BY SYRACUSE

Permanent underglaze colors. Beautiful shapes, styled for multi-purpose use.

WINDSWEPT, 6.95 BLUE MIST, 7.95 FLAME LILY, 6.95 FINESSE, 7.95

Prices are for 5-piece place settings. 16-piece starter sets from 19.95. 44-piece family sets from 56.95.

* BE SURE TO ASK YOUR DEALER FOR GUARANTEE CARD

Send for free illustrated brochure and name of nearest dealer.
Syracuse China ▪ Dept. CJ658 ▪ Syracuse 1 ▪ New York

considerable amount of jewelry and, with her departure for Europe drawing near, she had taken it from her safe-deposit box. There were diamonds that would choke a horse, Mrs. Stavely said, but the gold-lace ring was the only thing missing.

Odd, Lieutenant Corey thought; it suggested a specific end for the ring. Not for pawning purposes, because it was of relatively low value and much too easily traced. Had the ring been a gift to the woman who would be buried tomorrow? Had it been, in fact, a wedding ring?

Lieutenant Corey asked Mrs. Stavely for the chauffeur's name and description, and found himself balked again. Mrs. McGivern had referred to him as "Peter" and presumably he had come from an employment agency in Lynn or Boston. Mrs. Stavely thought he was about thirty, not tall but solidly built. She couldn't answer for his eyes, but he was fair-haired. "I don't like a blond man," said Mrs. Stavely forbiddingly, out of some reminiscence of her own.

A good-looking blond man of about thirty, Christian name Peter: it wasn't much of a description to circulate among Boston employment agencies after a lapse of two years. Lieutenant Corey was at the door when Mrs. Stavely's voice stopped him.

"Now that you mention it, I'm almost sure I've seen him recently. Or was it a picture of him? I remember thinking," she said slowly, "that he'd had his hair crew-cut. Now where ——"

Her eyes flickered around the crowded little sitting room, the magazine rack bulging with confession magazines and old newspapers.

Lieutenant Corey waited.

"I'll let you know," said Mrs. Stavely with an alert cock of her head. "It will come to me."

At first, Lou Fabian put down to pure nervousness the feeling that she was being watched. The membership applications were filed in the short back L of the office, and most of them provided some sort of background for the member in question; occupation was listed, and other clubs. Was there, put down unguardedly long before the kidnaping of Amy Heffernan, some small identifying fact?

The random activity in the drawing room, which Lou had noticed absent-mindedly when she came in, began to take on a purpose. The tennis table was requisitioned from the game room and draped in white. Alex appeared with trays of canapés and cocktails and lastly a cake with a single candle. A great basket of white roses was installed in the center of the table.

Somebody—Mrs. Engstrand, because it was her birthday—was giving a cocktail party. And anyone in the drawing room would be able to look directly into the office for as long as the party lasted.

The switchboard was quiet and blank. Lou went to the back of the office and pulled open the dusty file drawer.

Allen, Ansterly, Appleford. May, 1953. Jason E. Appleford and Miriam A. Occupation: tax consultant, office address on Wall Street. Two children, Arnold and Cecily. Other clubs: Bankers of Manhattan, Metropolitan.

Lou's memory flickered over something—but then it would, under the circumstances; it was a part of the hopelessness of what she was attempting. Even supposing she was able to nail down a reference to one of these people by the Heffernans, she had to remember that their acquaintance had been large and various, and that only one of that assemblage had been responsible for the kidnaping of Amy Heffernan.

She put the Applefords mentally to one side and pulled out the Damon application. It was dated June of this year, and it held no surprises: Charles L. Damon and Rosemary P. Occupation: commercial artist. One child, Elizabeth. No other clubs. Home address, Terence Drive, Bronxville.

What had she hoped to learn from this? Lou felt tense and so nervous that her fingers wanted to curl up in her palms. Still, she had started, she might as well finish. Engstrand ——

"Terrible," said a mild voice at the office barrier, "and a mistake from start to finish."

Lou slid the file drawer in with a small hurried crash and went back into the front of the office. Someone had left a Bridgeport evening paper on the barrier, and Miss Lovett had folded it to the blurred photo of Joseph Pavlow. Lou had already seen it. "Dishwasher Held," said the caption, and the cut line: "Joseph Pavlow, discharged kitchen employee at the Coastline Club, currently detained in connection with the slaying of an unidentified woman in the club grounds on Tuesday. See story, Page 3."

Joseph Pavlow peered mournfully out of the grainy black-and-white. "You can't tell me," said Miss Lovett definitely, "that's the face of a killer. Do you believe it, Miss Fabian?"

"I don't know much about it," said Lou carefully, "but I don't suppose killers always look like killers."

Miss Lovett gave her a long bright stare. "Perhaps not," she said briskly, "but this man ——" She tapped a finger on Pavlow's nose. "Never. Drink, women, petty larceny, but never murder."

Behind her in the drawing room, the cocktail party was in progress. Mrs. Engstrand wore gray lace with her usual collection of necklaces. Mrs. Ames wore blue lace and false pearls. Mr. Seward was concluding a gallant toast, and Miss Lovett returned to the drawing room to raise her glass with the rest.

Lou went back to her desk. She made a neat pile of papers that didn't belong together, and pretended to look for something in her center drawer. She did not return to the files; she sat at her desk and exposed herself, testingly. The whole plan, the kidnaping of Richard Mallory, had been built around the presence of Louise Royce. One of these people knew her pretended absorption, at this instant, for exactly what it was.

The cocktail party lengthened. Mrs. Severn tucked her hand protectively inside Miss Lovett's arm as though Miss Lovett required steadying, and the two moved off to the powder room next to the office. The back door of the office opened inquiringly and then fell shut. Mr. Seward, glass in hand, wandered amiably across the lobby, and gave Lou a kind, nearsighted beam.

"I see Mr. Mallory isn't here," he said in his gentle, considerate voice. "I hope that doesn't mean that Mrs. Mallory isn't well?"

Unlike Miss Lovett's, his eyes were not even remotely shrewd. "Mrs. Mallory's had a cold," said Lou, "but I believe she's better now."

Mr. Seward's eyes sparkled with interest. He was obviously a connoisseur of colds. "I had one myself at this time last year, and do you know it was October before I was rid of it." Mr. Seward, shaking his balding head at the mere memory, walked away.

Perhaps five minutes after that the cocktail was sent across from the drawing room.

It was a martini, and the gesture was unmistakable.

The newspapers had made much of that one martini a year ago, putting the "one" in quotes. Lou, her face colorless, only flicked a glance at the glass which Alex deposited on the barrier. "Who sent that, Alex?"

Alex opened his mouth and then stopped, puzzled at her tone. "One of the boys was supposed to bring it over, he said, but he forgot. I suppose Mrs. Engstrand ——"

But at that moment Lou caught Mrs. Engstrand's eye, and surely Mrs. Engstrand, before her face settled into benevolence, had looked faintly surprised?

"Would you ask him, Alex?" said Lou, and picked up the glass and sent a last glance into the drawing room before turning away. It was something of a shock to find herself staring squarely at Charles Damon.

Alex would not find out who had sent the drink, because the bus boy wouldn't remember.

Why had it been sent? A warning? A reminder that she was Louise Royce and, at least until the Mallory baby was returned, lay in the palm of someone's hand?

Lou poured the martini into the pot of ivy on her desk and went back to the files.

At eight o'clock Major Soames returned from New York, elated with the success of his hula mission. He had culled three authentic Hawaiian dancers. Large glossy photographs tumbled out of his attaché case, the display stand in the lobby was set up and adorned with three large dark women in grass skirts and flowers. Albert was summoned from the kitchen and asked about his preparations.

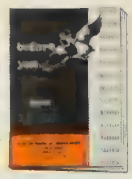
Lou lifted the barrier flap and came face to face with Ingalls and Dana Mallory.

Ingalls looked completely casual, except to an eye that had foolishly and helplessly memorized his face; Lou could see that under his idle air he was as rigid as iron. Dana looked much too gay. Her make-up was like a cry of despair in itself; she had cloaked her pallor with rouge, and a corner of her mouth showed blue against her lipstick. As a gesture, her appearance at all called for a salute; as a show of strength it was pitiful.

When you find a great man playing a big part on life's stage you'll find in sight, or just around the corner, a great woman. Read history! A man alone is only half a man; it takes the two to make the whole.

ELBERT HUBBARD

DEPENDABLE PACKING



safe and secure

"I could never pack so carefully."

Packing is an art that your Allied Mover has developed through years of experience. His special containers and padding materials assure the safest handling of your household goods. He's the No. 1 specialist in moving and storage, too!

FREE BOOKLET—Ask your Allied Mover for your copy of "Before You Move"—a booklet filled with tips on trouble-free moving. Look for his name in the Yellow Pages under "Movers."

CALL YOUR ALLIED MOVER

ALLIED VAN LINES, INC. • WORLD'S LARGEST LONG-DISTANCE MOVERS

Lou might have been a transparency; Dana's blank glance went deliberately through her.

Major Soames said cordially, "Mrs. Mallory," and let himself out into the lobby. "Off the sick list, eh? That's the way. How are you, Mr. Ingalls? I've been waiting for you people to join me in a drink."

Lou went back into the office, where Miss Patton was tiredly going through the wire basket. She said without any preface, "What's Mr. Gifford like?"

"Gifford Valves," said Miss Patton.

"I know, but what's he like himself?"

"Well, he's ——" Miss Patton paused considering. She said with an air of surprise, "I don't know. I've never met him."

"But you've seen him."

"Come to think of it," said Miss Patton cheerfully, "I've never seen him either."

"The Giffords have been coming here for five years," said Lou persistently. "Has anybody seen Mr. Gifford?"

"I suppose he goes back and forth to New York a lot," said Miss Patton vaguely. "And he does sign the checks for the cabin. They want to leave the day after tomorrow, by the way. So do the Damons and the Sewards. It's funny, when one goes the others start packing, but the major is going to try and persuade them to stay on for Hawaiian Night."

The day after tomorrow. The ransom would have been paid by then, and the child delivered. Or not delivered. In either case the hue and cry would be on, and the police would be informed about Louise Royce. Where, in the confines of a country club, would you conceal one hundred thousand dollars in cash?

Unless you didn't have to use the country club at all. Given a blank identity, like Mr. Gifford's, or a double identity—a few regular appearances under another name at one of the rooms let to summer people in the town—you would have a place for the child and the money. You could depart without undue haste, from the country club one day, after you had been thoroughly investigated, from the rented room the next.

"You look exhausted," said Miss Patton. "You'd better not come in until ten tomorrow. I'll cover here."

Lou thanked her and walked back to the cabin. She wasn't physically afraid, because she was important to the kidnaper's scheme of things, but she searched the cabin as she might have searched it for a poisonous snake. There was nothing out of place, nothing added.

In the next cabin Betsy Damon, having cried several people awake with her first tooth, commenced on a second. Lou woke in the night, hoped lucidly that Dana Mallory could not hear the crying, and went back to an uneasy sleep.

A number of things happened the next day. The dead woman was buried anonymously, at town expense, in the local cemetery. Lieutenant Corey attended the brief services. No reports had come in from the Boston employment agencies, which was not surprising, but Mrs. Stavely called triumphantly to say to Lieutenant Corey, "It began with a V, I'm sure of it. Peter . . . Vincent? No, not Vincent, but a V. It will come to me."

John Mallory drove back up from New York in his wife's white Jaguar; they hadn't foreseen the necessity of a car when Dana and Miss Rockett and Richard had been driven up in one of the Paige Company limousines. He carried the leather case that he was seldom seen without, and Dana Mallory—if anybody had been watching—met him smilingly at the door of the pink house and never looked at the case in his hand.

The heat that day seemed to color the air, to burn through shadows and collect in little buttery pools on the terrace. The silent tennis court shimmered in the sun, the golf course was deserted. Tempers rose noticeably. Major Soames spent a glowering hour at his desk and then went back up to his room. Max was savage, Miss Patton only slightly less so. Of them all Lou, being new, was expected to be helpful and uncomplaining.

At four o'clock she left the office. At four-thirty, her face buried gratefully in the cool water, she was swimming out toward the line of rocks at what she had come to think of as her end of the beach.

The other end was crowded. Towels and brilliant suits and a few huge peaked straw hats made a shifting pattern of color against the sand. The pattern dwindled as Lou took a final long stroke and grasped one of the rocks that formed the breakwater.

Somewhere close to her, Ingalls' voice said irritably, "Where have you been? I've been swimming up and down this beach for twenty minutes waiting for you, and now"—there was a necessary pause for breath—"I'm completely winded."

Lou could almost have laughed at the crossness of his tone. She said meekly, "I'm sorry. I just got here."

Water sloshed between them, a gull mewed overhead. Ingalls said rapidly, "We ought to be able to make some sort of check tonight. Is there anything you could logically be calling these people about at nine o'clock?"

How fantastic it sounded in the sunny air, above the slap and sparkle of water. "Fire extinguishers," Lou said; she had been wondering about this herself. "Every cabin has one, and they must be checked sometime or other. If they've already been checked this summer I can always say I found an old memo."

More water drifted in and out of the rocks while Ingalls inspected that. "Good girl," he said at last to the back of her white-capped head. "Do you want to go in first, or wait until I get out of here?"

"Going," said Lou. The whole conversation had consumed only two minutes, so that to anyone watching from the other end of the beach she had been only taking a breather.

Nine o'clock, she thought. Over four hours, time to be pushed back as purposefully as the water against her cupped and reaching palms.

But there was another and important deadline that she knew nothing about. Ingalls met it, as instructed, at eight o'clock.

"It's seventeen minutes of eight. Call it a quarter of," said Dana Mallory, and stared at Ingalls. Her voice had the tense and lashed-down quiet that hadn't altered in two days, her eyes were wild. "Do we have to ——"

Ingalls put down his fork and looked wearily across the table at John Mallory. He felt like a man trying to steady his aim on a target while someone pulled angrily on his arm.

"Yes," John Mallory was saying flatly. "We do have to. And Dana, you must eat something. You'll—we'll all ——"

Need it, his tone said, before the night is over. Because it was going to be a very long night.

Thirty-six hours had made a sharp change in Mallory. Ingalls supposed that the lines in his face had always been there, smoothed over by calm and confidence and cheerful diplomacy. The sudden defining of them gave him the look of a man who was actually and visibly cracking apart.

Ingalls glanced at his watch below the edge of the table. Dana said in the sheathed voice that was rubbing all their nerves raw, "I never want to see that girl again."

Ingalls was surprised at his own immediate anger. "I doubt that she'll ever want to see any of us again either," he said sharply.

"Really? It's twelve of eight," said Dana.

"If only I could remember," said John Mallory, "who it was who mentioned Miss Royce to me this spring. Somebody said, 'Awfully hard on the secretary. She'll be a long time living that down'; I remember that. Although I don't suppose that necessarily means it was ——"

"I do," said Ingalls in a hard voice, and Miss Rockett brought in coffee.

Ramshackle arrangements, he thought on his meticulously timed way up to the clubhouse: a message here, another there, more like a paper chase than the usual economy of ransom plans. But was it ramshackle or intentionally misleading?

First the penciled note, which Miss Rockett had obediently destroyed. Then the harsh whisper over the phone—not repeated, so that there could be no comparison by way of afterthought, but leading to the typewritten instructions he had picked up at the post office. Was it the typewriter used in the Heffernan case? Almost certainly not; type was too easily identified. Presumably the first machine had been safely disposed of, and it wasn't difficult, here on the edge of the Sound, to imagine what had happened to this one.

Then the post office discarded as a vehicle, nothing used twice.

Ingalls walked up the terrace steps and into the clubhouse. There was no one in the lobby. In the drawing room, Ruth Ann Gifford fiddled with the record player. Ingalls walked to the barrier and met Lou Fabian's eyes.

Ingalls said, "Did I leave an envelope around here this afternoon by any chance?"

Cool, impersonal, as though he shared nothing at all with this girl whose face had grown perceptibly thinner. It was necessary, as was Lou's polite "I'll see. . . . Would this be it?"

It was a white envelope like the others, unaddressed. "Thanks," said Ingalls, feeling the heaviness in one corner of the envelope, and took it and walked away. Foolish to think of this as a minor betrayal, except that he had asked something of Lou—a good deal, in fact—and kept this back. But he had been warned not to mention it to anyone.

Under the first street light on the driveway he tore off one end of the envelope and tipped the contents into his palm.

It was a key, a straight old-fashioned-looking key. The oblong of yellowed cardboard attached to it said, "Patonket Beach, Locker 6, Bathhouse C." There had been a name, but it had been rubbed out.

Ingalls walked back to the pink house. John Mallory was ready with the money in bundles of ten thousand dollars each in a Manila envelope, wrapped around with a striped beach towel. Ingalls took off his coat, rolled up his shirt sleeves like a man feeling the heat, and tucked the towel under his arm. It didn't look like ransom there; it looked like a casual evening swim.

John Mallory said tautly, "Good luck, Sam," and rubbed blankly at his forehead. Dana, unsmiling, said, "Have you got everything?"

"Everything" was the money, the key, and matches. (No flashlight.) Ingalls nodded and walked off into the dark.

After he had reached the club gates and the main road, it was a further fifteen minutes to the public beach. There were other strollers in the warm still night—a boy and girl with hands laced tightly together, an old man with a cane, two towel-slung boys whose laughter crackled around them like lightning. Cars went by at intervals. There was a kind of terrible normality about the whole thing.

Water appeared suddenly on his right, the Patonket yacht basin. Fifty yards beyond that was the entrance to the beach. The drive was a long narrow U, and the long sprawl of blackness on the water side was the line of bathhouses.

There were the usual parked cars, and a few flickers down on the sand that looked like a beach party. Ingalls walked off the drive and onto shell and stones that crunched underfoot and gave presently onto a boardwalk.

Bathhouse C. He was reluctant to light a match here in this exposed place, although the beach party seemed merry and preoccupied. If the three boardwalks angling down to the water on his right were any indication, his goal was at the far end.

Ingalls reached the third boardwalk, and paused. He had been right; a white placard in the mouth of the entrance bore a large black C. He hadn't long to wait, because just after his eyes had deciphered that, chimes somewhere in the town began to strike nine.

Dana heard the chimes. Sitting rigidly in the living room, she said, "He's leaving the money now. . . . He's left it."

She had willed Ingalls all the way to the beach, counting his footsteps with every beat of her heart; now, fiercely, she began to will him back.

The sudden peal of the telephone was shocking, even though it was much too soon to be the only call that mattered. John Mallory ran to the table under the stairs and picked up the receiver. Dana heard him say calmly, "This is he. . . . Yes, I've got that."

The receiver dropped back into place. John Mallory appeared briefly in the doorway. "That was—sounded like—Sam. I don't know why, but I've got to get over there. Be right back."

The screen door bounced once. The Jaguar burst into sound that dwindled and died.

Something had gone wrong.

Stiff, sleepwalking, Dana moved to the phone and picked it up. She knew and didn't care that the voice that answered was Louise Royce's. She said stumblingly, "That call you just put through here, was that ——"

The greatest happiness that love can yield is the first pressure of the hand of the woman one loves.

STENDHAL

Queerly, she couldn't get it into words. She knew that what seized her suddenly was sheer fright, constricting her lungs, producing a sick feeling of weight in her chest. She replaced the receiver very gently, and sat down on the lowest step of the stairs. The weight eased a little, the deafening, indignant pounding in her ears began to slow. After a time she even dared to lift her voice.

"Miss Rockett? . . . Miss Rockett!"

But no one answered.

Lou disconnected the pink house and heard the rubber line rattle back into its socket; she felt numb with alarm. Still ringing in her ears was the call just before that, the bright automatic voice saying summarily, "Mr. Sam Ingalls, please. Western Union calling."

Maybe it was Western Union, and maybe it wasn't. Lou thought rapidly that she couldn't be presumed to know that Ingalls wasn't available, and she had connected the call to the pink house just as the nine-o'clock chimes finished echoing.

Nine o'clock. Zero hour. No, zero hour minus one, or two—or how many until Richard Mallory was brought back?

Lou had watched helplessly while at about eight-thirty, after Ingalls had picked up his envelope and left the clubhouse, a beach party developed. Not at the club but at Patonket, the public beach where there was driftwood for fires. Lou couldn't tell where the suggestion had come from; it seemed suddenly full-fledged. The lobby echoed with voices: "You come in our car." . . . "No, we're taking ours anyway, come with us." . . . "Are we really going in? I mean should we bring towels and things?" So that none of them could be pinned down at the specific hour when the ransom was delivered.

Grimly, Lou tried anyway. She didn't have to ring Mrs. Engstrand's room because Mrs. Ames came by to say that her employer had gone to bed early, and if she woke and rang the office would Lou please say that Mrs. Ames had gone for a stroll?

Mrs. Severn had joined the beach party. So had the Applefords, and Miss Lovett, and the docile Smithwicks and a noisy couple who seemed to be Mrs. Severn's guests. Ruth Ann Gifford, who had not been allowed to go, was

CONTINUED ON PAGE 119

Shown: Model S-2411 $13.95. ($14.95 Colorado and west.)

New! The last word in style ...from the first name in stools!

● They're new all over . . . these style-setting Cosco stools with the hour-glass figure. Three heights: 16″ for bathroom; 24″ for counter and kitchen use; 30″ for game room or bar. Three seat styles: fixed, revolving or revolving seat with back. Available in chromium, ebony or new metallic tan finish. Washable, durable plastic upholstery in red, yellow, charcoal or mocha. See them now at hardware, furniture and department stores.

HAMILTON MANUFACTURING CORPORATION • COLUMBUS, INDIANA

Utility Tables and Carts, from *$6.75. Card Tables, from *$11.95. Folding Chairs, from *$7.45. Room Dividers, from *$13.95. Juvenile Seating, from *$8.45.

COSCO for every purpose
. . . every purse

*Slightly higher Colorado and west.

HOW PROUD YOU'LL BE OF YOUR GOLD RIBBON TAPPAN

Who wouldn't be proud? Just look at Tappan's incredibly beautiful new styling. The backpanel of illuminated glass decorated with fleur-de-lis. The wide-vision Visualite window gives you an inside view of the entire gleaming chrome-lined oven. It's fully automatic—starts, cooks, turns off without your being anywhere near. And Tappan's new Set 'N Forget burner controls your top-of-range cooking temperatures automatically. There's even a roast control that signals you, turns off oven automatically when roast is done exactly the way you like it. Both oven and broiler doors and entire top lift off for easy cleaning. Introductory budget terms now—for a limited time.

TAPPAN'S ALL-NEW HOLIDAY RANGE—just 30 inches wide. Giant chrome-lined oven is automatic, cooks full meals for up to 30 people. Power-driven rotisserie. Set 'N Forget automatic top burner—foods can't burn or scorch.

TAPPAN'S DELUXE ELECTRIC BUILT-IN lets you bake and broil at the same time. Chrome-lined double oven is fully automatic—starts, cooks, turns itself off. Set 'N Forget automatic top surface element.

WAIST-HIGH SMOKELESS BROILER has its own Visualite window. Broils with chef-like precision, seals in flame-kissed flavor.

TAPPAN SET 'N FORGET automatic surface burner ends potwatching and scouring. Foods can't burn or scorch even if you forget.

Nothing cooks like a

TAPPAN

The Tappan Company, Mansfield, Ohio. Also, Canadian Tappan Stove, Ltd. Montreal.

All through your active day...

new MUM® stops odor without irritation

So gentle for any normal skin you can use it freely every day

If you've ever worried about your deodorant failing . . . or about underarm stinging or burning from using a deodorant daily—now you can set your mind at ease.

New Mum Cream will stop odor right through the day and evening. And new Mum is so gentle for normal skin you can use it whenever you please. Even right after shaving, or a hot bath.

Contains no aluminum salts

Mum Cream gives you the kind of protection you can't possibly get from any other leading deodorant—because it works a completely different way.

Mum Cream is the only leading deodorant that works entirely by stopping odor. Mum contains no astringent aluminum salts (often the villain when it comes to irritation). It keeps on working actively to stop odor 24 hours a day with M-3—Mum's wonderful hexachlorophene that destroys both odor and odor-causing bacteria!

When Mum is so effective—yet so gentle—isn't it the deodorant for you?

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

MUM contains M-3 (bacteria-destroying hexachlorophene) ... stops odor 24 hours a day. Won't damage clothes.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 116

sulking over television in the drawing room. Lou, moving the inside wire mechanically from cabin to cabin on the switchboard, finally roused Mrs. Seward's pleasant, friendly voice. "Fire extinguisher? Of course, you're quite right, those things ought to be checked. Hold on." Lou listened. Mrs. Seward's voice came back cheerfully. "Ours seems to be fine."

There was no answer at the Gifford cabin. This was clearly hopeless. Lou was about to attempt the Damons when the annex light flashed on, and Miss Patton's voice said:

"Miss Fabian, have Max go down to the station right away. It's the nine-fifteen train, and the Duhamels are on it and they'll have fits if they aren't met."

How had Miss Patton been got at? Because this was what Lou had been unconsciously waiting for, a sudden errand away from the club at just this time—at, to be exact, ten minutes after nine. Nobody ever knew where Max was between eight-thirty and midnight.

"Max isn't here," said Lou steadily.

"Then you'll have to go. Take the station wagon. I'll be right over to cover the office." The phone went down.

Take the station wagon, go off into the night after some nonexistent people, try to explain that absence later . . . no, Lou thought. When the kidnaping was made public, when Louise Royce's name re-entered the newspapers and last year's speculations were dug up, would Miss Patton admit or even remember that she had been deceived?

The station wasn't open, but the taxi office across the street was. The train was on time. At eighteen minutes after nine Lou called and asked if there had been anyone for the Coastline Club. There had not, and the platform was bare.

She had known the Duhamels to be a name and a pretext, but the confirmation of it was peculiarly shocking. It felt dangerous, somehow, as though she would be paid back for this. Lou rested her face briefly on her hands, but a tangle of things kept on shifting behind her closed eyelids and shielding palms.

Mrs. Engstrand, saying to her companion, "We'll be in a pretty pickle." Miss Lovett: "You can't tell me that's the face of a killer." Something remembered about wool—"You can't pull the wool over my eyes"? No, that wasn't it. Rosemary Damon, complacent: "My husband has an awful temper."

The switchboard rattled. Rebelliously Lou rubbed the aching back of her neck before she lifted her head.

It was the pink house. And the sheerest chance did what scheming had not been able to do; after a single moment of listening, Lou was out in the dark and running.

Mrs. Stavely flogged grimly away at her memory. She felt flattered and important at Lieutenant Corey's interest.

Peter V—— With dinner for twelve women to supervise, Mrs. Stavely was slow in realizing that she must have seen the name and the face in print. How else, never having heard the man's last name, could she have arrived at the certainty of that V?

Her eyes were not what they had been, so that if the chauffeur's face had caught her eye on a printed page it hadn't been one of a row of tiny faces, but large and easily visible. His photograph would hardly have been in a magazine. A newspaper, then?

At eight-thirty, the maid was dismissed for the evening. The ladies looked at television and Mrs. Stavely went to her own room to write a bill to Mrs. Geary's nephew for one broken water pitcher and glass. There remained only the laundry, which had failed to return a sheet, and then Mrs. Stavely was free to take out her hoarded tabloids.

They made a steep and yellowing pile. They went almost three months back. Somewhere in here the chauffeur was hiding, like a cobweb or a spot of tarnish. Mrs. Stavely began to turn the pages.

The door of the pink house stood a little open. Lou pushed it wider in her headlong entrance, and the echoes of its crash bounced around the striped and empty hall and eddied into the living room.

Dana Mallory lay on the couch, her profile blank and colorless. At the head and foot of the couch, like guardian statues, John Mallory and Miss Rockett had turned to stare at Lou, standing transfixed in the doorway.

"I thought ——" Lou began breathlessly and then flushed deeply, and anger added itself to the charged atmosphere. She had run heedlessly out of the office and down the dark driveway because she had thought, from the barely breathing quiet of the open telephone line from this house, that Dana Mallory was stricken and possibly dying. Now she had to explain to these hostile faces that she was not a kidnaper's emissary.

And where had they been? Something had certainly happened to Dana; she had fainted, at the very least. Miss Rockett stirred. She said in a voice that was little more than a hoarse mumble, "I thought I heard him—crying, somewhere outside ——" She shook her head dazedly. "A cat, could it have been?" she asked.

No one answered Miss Rockett's question. John Mallory said stiffly, "There was a telephone call ——" and Dana Mallory turned her head very slowly on the couch and looked at Lou.

"Where is he, Miss Royce?" The whisper was as shocking as a shriek. "Where is my baby? The money wasn't marked, I swear it. I won't prosecute, I'll ——"

I. My baby, as though the man standing at the foot of the couch did not exist. No one, thought Lou, should look at another human being as Dana Mallory was looking at her. She said curtly, "I have no idea where your baby is, Mrs. Mallory," and would have turned

CONTINUED ON PAGE 121

"With a little ingenuity you could easily remodel it as a charming old-fashioned farmhouse."

Change These "Danger Zones" to "Beauty Zones" in Just 7 Days with this new 2-way moisturizer!

★ Frown lines!
★ Crow's feet!
★ Flaky patches!
★ Expression lines!
★ Crepey throat!

Now flood precious moisture deeper into the "danger zones" where dry-skin lines tell lies about your age! Get the two-way benefits of new Woodbury Dry Skin Cream. This remarkable blend of skin softeners and rich, beauty-giving lanolin acts to moisturize and soften your face and throat.

Woodbury's new deeper moisturizing ingredients and deeper softening ingredients penetrate as never before to help your skin feel fresher and smoother, look younger!

Use this silky, fragrant cream as a moisturizing cleanser and as a skin softener. In just 7 days you'll see the "danger zones" change to "beauty zones" or your money back! 25¢ to $1.

WOODBURY LANOLIN RICH DRY SKIN CREAM

...MAKES YOUR PUDDINGS

Chocolate or Nut Chocolate, Butterscotch or Vanilla — My-T-Fine desserts are deep-flavored. Create your own specialties easily. Try crumbled-candy toppings or two flavors layered in parfait glasses.

...MAKES YOUR PIES

Bake pie shell or tart shells. Fill with My-T-Fine. Vary with a chiffon filling or whipped-cream topping. Cool, light — unforgettable.

...MAKES YOUR CANDIES

Yes, this talented dessert makes a delicious chocolate fudge — quickly, easily! Get My-T-Fine Nut Chocolate Pudding — follow recipe on the box. Mm-m-m!

MY-T-FINE MAKES YOUR BEST DESSERTS

P.S. Only My-T-Fine gives you added iron you need daily

CHOCOLATE ▪ NUT CHOCOLATE ▪ VANILLA ▪ BUTTERSCOTCH ▪ LEMON ▪ INSTANT AND REGULAR

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 119

go except for the sudden awareness of some-e behind her.

Ingalls said quietly over her head, "Who is the phone call from, John?"

Mallory's face was tight and expressionless. ou, all at once unable to take even a moment ore of this clamped-down hysteria, bent her ad and brushed blindly past Ingalls, feeling e light detaining touch of his hand on her re arm.

"Wait," said Ingalls.

"No," said Lou, and pulled the front door en and then shut behind her.

She felt, walking rapidly back up to the ubhouse, as though she had shed a clinging, nothering coat, and could now fight back hampered. Caution, yes, because now—the nsom money delivered and the child still in e kidnaper's hands—was the most danger-us time of all. But not any more of the passive aiting; she was through with that.

Miss Patton was at the switchboard when e entered the office, saying, "Yes, major," d "No, major," and finally hanging up. She ve Lou a severe glance. "When it's necessary r you to leave the office, Miss Fabian ——"

But Lou, in the hall of the pink house, had opped being a dutiful employee of the Coast-ne Club. She said crisply, "Who told you at some people named Duhamel were com-g in on the nine-fifteen train, Miss Patton?"

"Duhamel?" Miss Patton's white brow crin-led blankly. "I never heard of any Duhamels. eally, Miss Fabian, you must be ——"

But Lou was out of the office, walking the ngth of the drawing room to the leather cur-in that screened the al-ove. The television set as on, with a quiz show progress: a wildly beam-ng master of ceremonies ried excitedly to Lou's set ace, "An automatic wash-r-dryer, a complete fall ardrobe, a three-thousand-ollar mink stole—all for ucky, lucky you, Mrs. George Linsey of Smallwood, Pennsylvania!"

The room was empty, the window not quite losed.

Lou snapped the set off and went back to he office. Miss Patton had evidently had time o remember that Lou's presence at all was npaid overtime; she said almost apologeti-ally, "Major Soames always has a fit if the ffice is left —— What is it, Miss Fabian?"

Lou had turned her back, plugged in an in-ide wire, and was pulling violently on a key. She said, "Is Ruth Ann there, Mrs. Gifford?"

"My daughter has gone to bed," said Mrs. Gifford frostily. "May I ask who ——"

"Lou Fabian, at the office. I'd like to speak o Ruth Ann please, Mrs. Gifford. It's quite mportant."

"Really, Miss Fabian. My daughter came in exhausted, and I'm sure that whatever it is will keep until morning. Perhaps you didn't real-ize that it's nearly ten o'clock?"

"I know it is, Mrs. Gifford, but I don't think Ruth Ann could be asleep yet."

"You don't think! I don't know that I like your tone, Miss Fabian."

"I don't know that I like having tricks played on me," said Lou, equally cold, "or rather, I do know that I don't. That's why I want to talk to your daughter."

There was a gasp. "In all the years I have been coming here," said Mrs. Gifford meas-uredly, "I have never encountered such—such ——"

"Unwarranted impudence," said Lou head-ily. "I know how you feel. I've never come up against a girl like Ruth Ann before either."

This time there was a paralyzed silence. "Connect me with Major Soames, please, at once," said Mrs. Gifford, breathing hard.

"No," said Lou, and hung up.

Go to the Gifford cabin? Rout out and con-front Ruth Ann? No one else at the club had her powers of mimicry, but certainly her mal-ice and pride in her own accomplishments had been directed; the time factor could not be a coincidence. On the other hand, Mrs. Gifford was probably interrogating her daughter at this instant, and receiving a tearful denial which they would both back up to the hilt.

Show me a family of read-ers, and I will show you the people who move the world.

NAPOLEON

The whole incident would become, later, an attempt on the part of Louise Royce to throw suspicion on a child of thirteen.

And how could she explain her insistence on this point without explaining why it mattered? This was the weaponless time, this was when Veuchen—the ransom collected and counted—had become bothered by Amy Heffernan's crying, and left her to die in a swamp.

What, thought Lou, staring at the switch-board in a flash of panic, what, just possibly, had she done?

"Veuchen," chattered Mrs. Stavely's ex-cited voice into the telephone. She had been interrupted by a number of things in her search of the Sunday tabloids, and although she wasn't used to staying up until after ten o'clock triumph had conquered fatigue. "V,e,u,c,h,e,n, Peter Veuchen. He's got his head down but I know it's him. The haircut must have put me off before. I suppose they did that in prison. And do you know," said Mrs. Stavely, her voice mounting into italics, "what he was in prison for?"

Lieutenant Corey knew, after a single echo of the name in his brain. It was the Long Island kidnaping case of a year ago, and the child had died. He wasn't familiar with the details of the case, beyond the fact that Veu-chen's conviction and execution were not, in the opinion of some people, the complete wrapping up that they might have been. And there had been a widow, above suspicion for a number of carefully documented reasons. Hence no fingerprints ——

Corey hung up at last. He looked calm and methodical, but his hand was damp and cramped from its grip on the receiver, and excitement was building up inside him.

That Veuchen had left a widow was a matter of record. So was the theft of the gold-lace ring, worn on the dead woman's wedding finger. Looking carefully in all directions; Corey jumped to a conclusion.

Once he had jumped, he abided by it. Why hadn't Mrs. Veuchen been missed from her apartment or rooming house? It was axio-matic that in large cities no one cared whether his neighbor lived or—in this case—died. The dead woman had appeared on the station platform without baggage, without even hat or gloves.

The absence of hat and gloves had at first indicated someone already in the town, going hastily to the station to meet an incoming train. In Mrs. Veuchen it would indicate—what? A spur-of-the-moment trip, just as she was. Very possibly, something more concrete than the vague official feeling that her husband might not have been the sole or even the pri-mary agent in the Long Island kidnaping. A remembered profile glimpsed on the street, or a voice overheard at a newsstand or a ticket window, and followed instantly, out of a bit-terness that could only be guessed.

Whatever she had planned at the end of the chase had to be done in secrecy, because at least two hours had elapsed between her arri-val at the station and her death in the woods. Had she spent it waiting at the back of more than one cabin?

And what was her quarry doing at the Coastline Club? Relaxing on the never-discov-ered share of the Long Island ransom money? Or ——

The Mallorys. Moneyed, the wife an invalid. Parents of an infant son.

It was Ingalls who met him at the door of the pink house. He looked over the lieuten-ant's shoulder and said, "Turn that thing off!" and at the explosive quiet of his voice, without waiting for the lieutenant's nod, Ser-geant Ennis went back to turn off the beacon-ing red blinker.

"Well, that's done it," said John Mallory dully, behind Ingalls. "That's—done it!"

They were to have waited, Corey discovered a few minutes later, for a telephone call which would contain instructions for picking up the child. It wasn't likely, with the police car flashing its way up the driveway at just this

...you need the NEW

UNIVERSAL Coffeematic

with the FLAVOR-SELECTOR

Start his day with wonderful, full-bodied Coffeematic coffee and you'll be sure of breakfast with a smile. Just set the Flavor-Selector to the strength you prefer. Automatically it brews to perfection, signals when ready and keeps coffee at serving temperature without increasing the strength. Enjoy the finest coffee you ever tasted, get a new Universal Coffeematic today!

Deluxe ten-cup model
Chrome on solid copper $29.95
Others, $14.95 to $32.95

UNIVERSAL

People just love that new PRO

double duty

TOOTH BRUSH

No other type of tooth brush does so much for you with so little effort on your part!

No wonder people are cheering about the new Pro Double Duty Tooth Brush—it's a long step forward in modern dental care! Polishes teeth bright as it massages gums automatically towards healthy firmness. Unconditional money-back guarantee. Get the new Pro Double Duty Tooth Brush today.

Your smile will say it's better!

Pro-phy-lac-tic Brush Co., Florence, Mass.

STOP PAIN INSTANTLY
COMBAT INFECTION-PROMOTE HEALING WITH STAINLESS

Campho-Phenique

(PRONOUNCED CAM-FO-FIN-EEK)

WHEN USED ON PIMPLES-ACNE

CAMPHO-PHENIQUE HELPS PREVENT THEIR SPREAD AND RE-INFECTION

It's wonderful, too, for fever blisters, cold sores, gum boils, cuts and scratches, minor burns caused by book matches, hot cooking utensils, hot water or steam. Campho-Phenique relieves itching of insect bites, poison ivy, etc. Just apply Campho-Phenique next time and see how fast this pain-relieving antiseptic goes to work. And it doesn't stain the skin! Get a bottle today.

KNOX GELATINE
THE ONE WAY TO HELP
SPLITTING NAILS

AT YOUR GROCER'S

SHOWN AGAIN BY NEW MEDICAL RESEARCH

No need to waste money on expensive, unproved, multi-dose capsules. Once a day drink one envelope (115-120 grains) of proved Knox in bouillon, fruit juice or water. About 5¢ per envelope. This way 7 out of 10 restored fingernails within 90 days.

TO DOCTORS: For reprints of clinical reports published in medical journals, write Knox Gelatine, Johnstown, N. Y.

© 1958 Knox Gelatine Co.

hour, that the call would be made. It was much more likely ——

Dana Mallory went completely out of control. The nurse put her to bed and administered a hypodermic. Lieutenant Corey, feeling as cold as he looked, called the Byfield police in the next town and requested men. Having come at all, he would have to come in force. There was still a chance that a disaster could be turned into a coup, that at—he glanced at his watch—a little after eleven o'clock arrangements for the return of the Mallory baby had already been set in motion, and could not now be stopped.

That done, he went out to join Sergeant Ennis in the dark sedan which, its blinker silenced, was just another car in the hot black night. It was time to see—the name burned angrily in his mind—Louise Royce.

Louise Royce wasn't in her cabin, although the lamps were lit and there was a general look of occupancy. She was, seconds after Lieutenant Corey's knock, a white face turned up to him in the grassy lane between her cabin and the Damons'. She said in a dazed voice, "They've—I think they've gone."

Lou had had a visitor after her return to her cabin at a little after ten-thirty. She felt not so much tired as stunned. She had done all she could, and there was nothing to do now but wait for what, as soon as the baby was returned, was certainly coming. Until then she was helpless.

Sleep was out of the question. Lou turned on lights, and jumped tensely at the sound of feet mounting the cabin steps. A timid rap at the door followed.

It was Mrs. Ames, gentle and distressed. She entered hesitantly and said, "I beg your pardon, but it was you upstairs the other night, wasn't it, when Mrs. Engstrand —— I mean, the door was open."

Mrs. Engstrand's whiplike voice came back, saying, "She answered the phone there a lot of the time, and we'll be in a pretty pickle if ——"

"I want to assure you," Mrs. Ames was saying firmly, "that they're quite safe. I realize how valuable they are, and I know Mrs. Engstrand can be . . . forgetful, but I do think that at her time of life, to tell her that pearls she's worn since her marriage are now a part of the estate and that she mustn't wear them any more but turn them over to the bank, is ——"

Something of Lou's total blankness penetrated. "Mr. Heffernan is one of the executors, but of course you knew that, didn't you?" said Mrs. Ames uncertainly. "Mrs Engstrand was so sure you knew all about that family fight over the pearls, she insisted —— Oh, dear. Dear me. What have I done?" she asked in a faint voice.

It was what Lou had so recently asked herself. She told Mrs. Ames that she had never noticed Mrs. Engstrand's pearls, wouldn't care if she had, and had already forgotten the conversation. Mrs. Ames fluttered gratefully out the door, and put her head back in to say surprisingly, "They're quite right, you know, she really shouldn't wear them. She's a bit ——" tapped her temple significantly, and vanished again.

The night pulsed with crickets, an innocent country sound which would always, for Lou, be a counterpoint to dread. She turned off the lights and lay on her bed in darkness, staring at the faint drift of black leaves against the screens. After what seemed an indefinite and almost dreaming period, she was staring at light instead.

The light was trembling and uncertain, in the Damons' cabin. It was more like lightning than any steady glow, leaving intervals of blackness between the flickers. Lou, propped on her elbow, realized that it must be a loose connection in, from the way the cabins were laid out, the Damons' bedroom. Odd that hadn't waked them.

It was mild wonder one moment, a formless alarm the next. With the peculiar clarity that invests such moments, marking them out for memory later, Lou watched herself turn on a lamp in the living room, felt the door wrench open under her hand, listened to the tap of heels on the wooden steps. The Damons' station wagon, usually parked on the far side of the cabin, was gone.

Had they taken Betsy out for the evening? It wasn't really late, not much after eleven—still, there was Rosemary Damon's round-eyed solemnity over naps and bottles, never early, never late. Lou went back to her side of the cabin and stood on tiptoe at the bedroom window. The ground sloped down there, and she could just see over the sill.

Had the lamp bulb died, or worked itself loose? It trembled on so suddenly that Lou, unprepared, caught only the most fleeting glimpse of the empty disordered room inside. Moments later she was saying to Lieutenant Corey's hostile face, "I think they've gone."

Corey looked coldly at her, started to speak and stopped himself. He knows who I am, Lou thought, but that was submerged in the new and shapeless dread. Corey moved past her in silence and shone his flashlight through the window; he walked from there to the living-room window. The woods behind the cabin gave surprised and leafy stir and a few drops of rain began to fall in the waiting stillness.

"Ennis," said Lieutenant Corey, "go up to the office and get key."

The police car departed with a roar. Another drove up immediately, white-lettered in the half-lit dark: "Byfield Police." Lieutenant Corey went to talk to the man who jumped out of it. There was a rapid exchange of short questions and shorter answers. The door slammed, the Byfield car shot up toward the clubhouse.

They must have the baby back, Lou thought wildly, because otherwise no one would risk this. No one would willingly panic a kidnaper. Somehow she got the question out, and Lieutenant Corey whirled and said in a flat, hard voice, "No, Miss Royce."

There wasn't time for more than that. Ennis came back with the maid's key to the Damons' cabin. With the door open Corey said in the same hard voice, "Coming, Miss Royce?" and Lou, filled with a sick dread that had nothing to do with the police, went obediently inside.

Panic, she had thought, and this was panic made visible. Not so much in the living room although a pink baby blanket was stuffed into a chair and an ash tray had been upset on the rug, as in the bedroom and kitchenette. The beds were tumbled, bureau drawers had been stripped and left half open. The closet was empty. On the floor in one corner was a stack of clean gauze diapers.

The sink in the kitchenette was piled with dirty dishes. On its edge, with an ounce of milk still remaining in the bottom, was a baby's feeding bottle.

Lou looked again at the drainboard, stared through the window over the sink, and ran into the bathroom. There was a white diaper can there, as there had been at the Heffernans', with a plastic liner, and when she lifted the lid with the glass deodorant dispenser clamped inside, she saw a huddle of used diapers in the bottom.

Lieutenant Corey was at the telephone. He must have had knowledge to add to this, because he was finishing crisply, "—— wanted for questioning. . . . That's right. They'll have a baby with them."

"I don't think they will," Lou said.

Lieutenant Corey said something sharp into the telephone and looked coldly at Lou. "They've left a baby bottle," Lou said over the ache in her throat, "and one of those divided

In the matter of food, people are particularly apt to be conservative, and for the most irrational reasons. Frederick the Great had to persuade his peasants to eat potatoes by sending uniformed gendarmes among them. Count Rumford, head of the army of the elector of Bavaria, had to force soldiers to cultivate and consume potatoes, so that they acquired the habit and took it with them among the people after they left the army.

ASHLEY MONTAGU
Man: His First Million Years
Published by World Publishing Company not plates that you put cereal and fruit in, and a little spoon. They've left a little coat and bonnet, and even the bassinet they brought her in. It's out there on the lawn in the r-rain."

Uncontrollably, out of forty-eight hours of unremitting strain, Lou burst into tears. Corey watched her expressionlessly; Sergeant Ennis, kind and horrified, said, "Well, here now, here," and led her to a chair.

"Let's have a look at that bassinet," said Corey.

Lou watched from the window. She had stopped crying, but her cheeks and eyelids felt stiff with the tears she hadn't wiped away. Sergeant Ennis had maneuvered the police car almost onto the tiny patch of lawn behind the cabin, and the brilliant headlamps lit it up nakedly against the dark backdrop of the woods. Neither man, she saw, touched the bassinet. Both of them bent to look at something in the grass beside it; their heads turned very slowly, as though they were trying to follow the progress of something live.

Whatever it was wasn't there. Ennis took a flashlight and went to the edge of the woods, sending a strong circle of gold on the ground before him. Corey straightened suddenly and impatiently and his hip hit the bassinet. The bassinet rolled slowly and lazily for perhaps a foot and a half on the uneven grass, its rain-wet pink plastic skirt swaying.

Corey bent, his new attention visible even ten yards away through the rain-dribbled glass. He went down on his haunches, probing with his hands, and then he called sharply to Ennis.

No. No!

Ennis came out of the woods and went back to the cabin at a run. From somewhere—under the porch?—there were muffled sounds. Ennis reappeared, nodded at the lieutenant, and went back to the police car. He drove off with jack-rabbit speed toward the clubhouse; in an incredibly short time he was back, with the headlamps and now the searchlight spewing gold across the grass.

He didn't rejoin Lieutenant Corey at once. Lou listened uncomprehendingly to his noisy progress around the cabin. When she opened the door, he was holding a shovel. He said awkwardly, "If you don't mind, miss, the lieutenant would like you to come out a minute." Steadily, drained dry of any emotion at all, Lou walked ahead of him out into the rain.

It was clearly a grave, the sod cut and lifted and replaced, with only a dark dribble or two of earth to betray the fact of digging at all. Both policemen had treated the bassinet with instinctive care, and if Corey had not bumped it its skirts would have concealed their secret until morning.

Lieutenant Corey was doing the digging, shallowly, cautiously. Lou listened to the steady probe of the shovel and kept her gaze fixedly on the woods. She allowed nothing to come between, not Ingalls' face—how long would she carry that?—nor Dana Mallory's, nor even small sleeping Richard's.

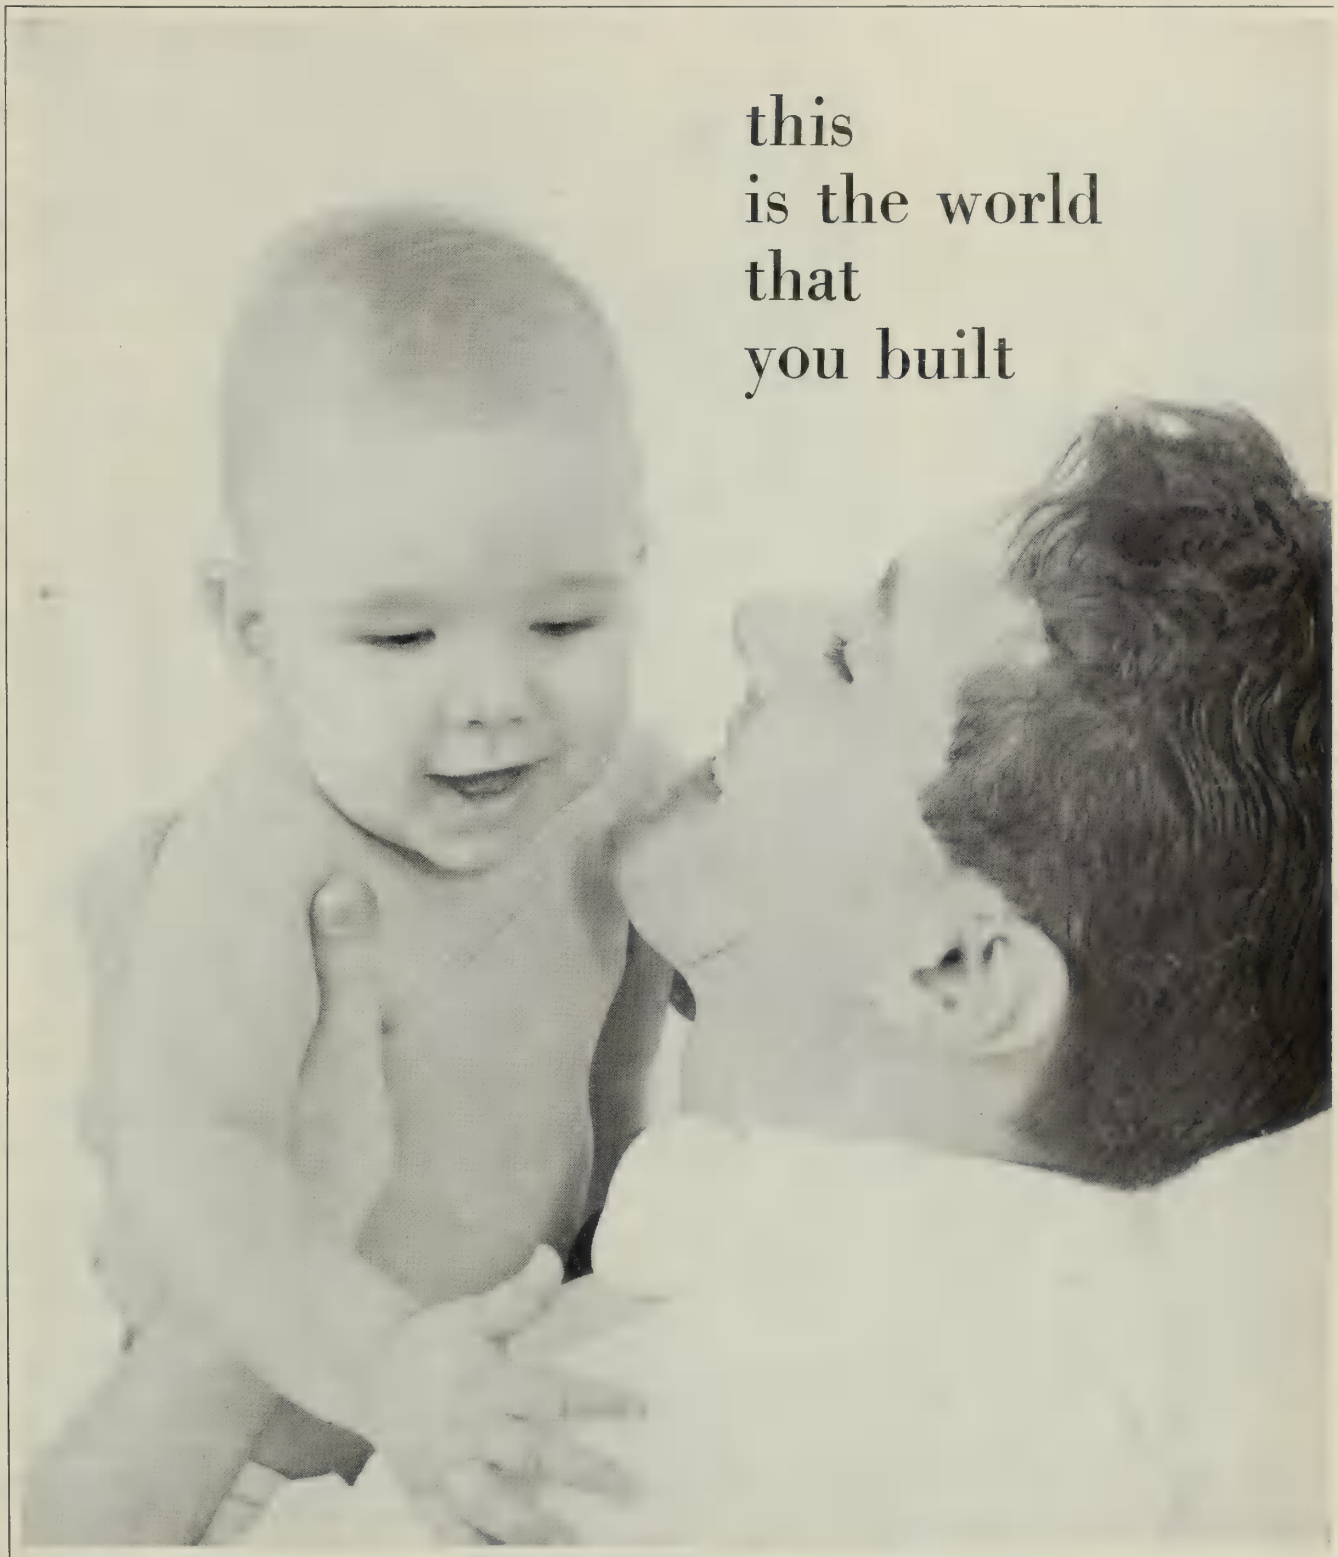
The shovel paused. Sergeant Ennis sucked his breath in, said, "Oh, my God, sir!" and turned away. Lou could sense the violent movement of his shoulders. Slowly, helplessly, her own gaze shortened until she looked at gilded grass, a pile of patiently scooped-out earth, a shadowed hole, a small bent arm and part of a little face.

Lieutenant Corey got down on his knees and used his hands, and the night split open around Lou.

Betsy Damon. Crying monotonously in the night, kicking in her bassinet, draining the last drop from the bottles her mother held up so triumphantly. Not very visible in the tender cradle of Rosemary Damon's arms, but omnipresent in the twice-a-week diaper delivery, the miniature wash.

Betsy Damon was, and always had been, a twenty-four-inch pink vinyl doll, and her voice lay around her in the jagged black pieces of a shattered phonograph record.

Once the fact of the doll was established, a further conclusion was almost inescapable. The Damons—although it was to be doubted now that that was their name—had been the instruments and not the agents of the plan. They would not have panicked otherwise. They would have collected the ransom, swaddled the doll the next day when the rent of their cabin was up, and gone quietly away to disappear at their leisure.



It must have been presented to them as being temptingly simple and comparatively without risk. The big hurdle in kidnaping was the concealment and well-being of the child, and what safer hiding place than a cabin not three hundred yards away from his home, where there was known to be a baby and a doting young mother? With Mrs. Mallory recovering from a heart attack, the Mallorys would be doubly sure not to contact the police, and in the unlikely event of anything's going wrong the baby could be spirited back in a matter of minutes.

The plan had a dazzling boldness to recommend it, but like everything else it was subject to chance. Out of a combination of circumstances Mrs. Veuchen had turned up and had had to be silenced at once. Perhaps murder hadn't come along in the bargain. Certainly, upon the lieutenant's call to Rosemary Damon to make doubly sure of her identification of Joseph Pavlow, the Damons had lost their heads.

Judging by the milk in the nursing bottle, which had not yet formed a hard line around the glass, the Mallory baby had been in the Damon cabin until an hour or so ago. Where was it now?

Corey was desperately worried about the baby because it would be said that by his headlong arrival at the club in a police car he had forced the kidnaper's hand. This was the kind of case that came along once, and made or broke a career man. No one would remember that the killing of Veuchen's widow had been solved; if the Mallory baby died on this rainy night it would go down in the annals as typical police blundering.

Louise Royce was pale and steady under his questions. She said at last in a voice so des-

And loving care keeps it a happy world. Chix knows how much you care. That's why extra quality goes into every Chix product—gauze diapers, disposable diapers, crib sheets, diaper liners. Chix makes the very best!

Next to you, Chix cares the most

Chux Disposable Diapers are proof of the extra care that goes into every Chix product. They're the most absorbent disposables made. They're medicated to prevent diaper rash. They're soft and gentle. And strong. Try Chux soon for everyday use, for traveling, too.

MADE BY Johnson & Johnson COMPANY

Copyright, Chicopee Mills, Inc.

So silky, so smooth, so freshly fragrant!

Cashmere Bouquet Talcum Powder does such lovely things for you!

That skin-slim bathing suit will slip right on without a wiggle if you smooth silky Cashmere Bouquet talc over your skin. Always have a can of it with you at the beach!

It's like climbing right into a bouquet, when you feel the cool, petal-soft touch of Cashmere Bouquet talc! Smooth it all over—and there you are—all pampered and perfumed with a Spring-fresh fragrance! Use it after every bath.

Keep baby feeling soothed and comfy! Cashmere Bouquet is as soft and silky as any special baby powder. And it keeps baby as fresh and sweet as a flower. It's so handy to have one powder you both use!

Cashmere Bouquet TALCUM POWDER

The Fragrance Men Love

perate as to sound earnest, "Look, lieutenant, I don't know where the baby is, and you don't know and, even if you arrest me first, hadn't you better start looking for him? Somebody"—her voice began to shake—"somebody's got to."

Lieutenant Corey drove her up to the clubhouse under the usual warning. There was no book to follow here. Besides the baby, there was the ransom money; the Byfield police car had stopped on its way to the club and the towel-wrapped envelope was gone from the bathhouse locker. The money was not in Louise Royce's cabin. They had already taken that apart.

Corey had no search warrants, but he made a short incisive speech to the people assembled in the clubhouse. He said that the Mallory baby had been kidnaped and the child was believed to be on the grounds. Routine demanded that the cabins be checked before the wider, grimmer search began. He made no response at all to the babble of questions that broke out after an interval of shock and disbelief.

With Louise Royce safely under the eye of Sergeant Ennis in the drawing room, Corey collected keys from the stunned Miss Patton, recruited Max and the two men from Byfield, and went out into the rain.

Now that it had come, and it was so exactly what she had expected it to be, Lou felt unnaturally calm. As soon as the baby was found, she would be arrested. She would repeat her own story over and over. and how thin and unbelievable it would sound; somehow people insisting that they were the victims of a plot were suspect, like people who always thought they were being followed.

Oddly, no one seemed to miss the Damons. Everyone else was here, in the drawing room or lobby or bar; only Mrs. Gifford and Ruth Ann were absent. And they all wore the same degree of reaction, even their voices queerly alike.

They drifted into the drawing room as though drawn by Lou, who as an insider might have more information. Miss Lovett, her ruddy face solemn; Mr. Appleford, looking appalled, his wife imperturbable as usual. Mrs. Seward, with a handkerchief pressed to her mouth and her husband's arm anxiously about her; Mrs. Engstrand, whom the excitement had awakened, vast and animated in gray lace hung with wood and glass and china and the defiantly worn pearls. Mrs. Severn appeared to have been shocked sober.

Miss Lovett, as spokesman, was saying, "When was the child kidnaped, Miss Fabian, do you know? There can't be any harm now ——"

Lou shook her head without speaking.

"Sergeant?" persisted Miss Lovett. "Surely we have a right to know."

Sergeant Ennis said woodenly, "You'd have to ask the lieutenant, ma'am."

"You certainly don't still suspect that poor creature you have locked up, do you? But I'd have to ask the lieutenant that, too, I suppose," said Miss Lovett tartly, and turned away.

Rain washed against the drawing-room windows and splashed on the terrace. The police would soon have finished with the cabins; the baby would not be there, nor would the ransom money. The police were not dealing with a criminal pattern, but with a brilliant amateur who was probably improvising as he went along.

She closed her eyes briefly. With the windows and doors shut against the rain and people milling around, the inevitable scents were bottled up and strengthened. Cigarette smoke, and the strong, almost rank fragrance of the carnations. A man's hair tonic, a number of conflicting perfumes.

And something else, something alien.

Kerosene?

No, but something close to that. Lou had always been blessed, or cursed, with an acute sense of smell, and this was as warning in its way as smoke. Whatever it was, it took her back again to remembered terror. Lou could feel her heart beating fast and urgently, because inevitably the scent would lose its sharp edge and thin away beyond recognition, and the moment when she could have reached her hand out and touched a kidnaper would be gone.

It was going already because the lobby door opened and then closed again as someone came in.

It wasn't Lieutenant Corey. It was Ingalls, walking directly up to Lou. He said, "That telegram for me ——"

His voice stopped. Lou followed his cold stare to Sergeant Ennis, standing at one of the tall windows a few feet away.

Ingalls said, "Is Miss Fabian under arrest, sergeant?"

"No, sir. Not ——"

Ingalls made an exasperated sound, took Lou's hand and pulled her with him into a corner of the room, not heeding her resistance.

He had to get back, he said, his voice low and rapid, but first he wanted to explain —— Lou didn't care what he wanted to explain, all her senses were tingling with effort. She realized only later that he had said the telegram was in answer to one of his to a Chicago hotel; he had even checked up on John Mallory's whereabouts the night the baby was kidnaped. And Mallory hadn't been there; he had run across a woman he had known before he met Dana and they had spent the evening together. His hotel reservation had not been held for him, Mallory said, but there had been a vacancy at the woman's hotel and he had stayed there.

"—— their own problem, and none of my business," Ingalls was saying. "John didn't think it was just the time to have Dana find out about it. That's why he took off for the nearest phone ——"

Cleaning fluid, Lou thought, clinging blindly to her own thread. And under it, sharp and unmistakable when you knew what it was —— Why had no one else noticed? If she were wrong now—but she wasn't, she couldn't be. It was all at once like a picture drawn for children, with trees and clouds and clumps of grass that, looked at with preknowledge, concealed the shapes of cats and dogs and owls. And this was the tiger. Meek, sleek, as companionable as in the most frightening fairy tales. Not looking at her now; the only one, in fact, who wasn't.

"Not wool," Lou said in a clear and wondering voice, "fleece. The golden fleece, Mr. Heffernan said, so you did know them, or they knew you. Something to do with tax returns, was it?"

The beaming gaze stilled on her face. "Mr. Heffernan? I don't believe I know ——"

"I think you do," said Lou. She was unable to listen longer because the lobby had begun to quake goldenly around her. "The baby has spat up on you, Mr. Appleford."

Out of a blur of uncertainty after that, Lou remembered isolated things.

At some point Ingalls hit Jason Appleford, not expertly but very hard. Miss Patton screamed. The glass doors opened to let in Lieutenant Corey and Max and the men from Byfield, and Appleford's light gray sports coat was politely requested of him and passed from hand to official hand. Ennis, the father of five, moved his large nose seekingly, halted, rubbed a thumbnail very gently against the nap of the wool, and murmured to Corey.

There wouldn't be much, after the hasty operation with the cleaning fluid, but Lou knew from experience at the Heffernans' that a single drop of regurgitated milk was equal in power to a flood of almost anything else. Chemical analysis would prove it without doubt—and Appleford would know that.

Lou found that she didn't want to look at him; when he snapped his fingers suddenly, she did. Appleford said concentratingly, "I'm just trying to think how —— Of course! That young girl with the kid that we gave a lift to this afternoon—you remember, Miriam ——"

And Miriam Appleford, moving a little farther away as though to avoid a spot on her impeccable white linen dress, looked at her husband and said in her cool, uninflected voice, "Don't involve me, please, and don't expect me to lie for you."

That was when the shouting began, not inside but outside. A police reporter making a late routine check of Corey's office had evidently followed him here, and from somewhere he had recruited a photographer. The lavender-white explosion of a flash bulb caught a fat triumphant bus boy with a small inert bundle in his arms.

Richard Mallory wasn't dead, although at first glance he seemed not to be breathing. Still wearing the blue cotton sleeping bag in which he had been lifted out of his crib, he had been found in one of the tarpaulined playpens under the picket-fenced elm. Nobody had thought to look there until the enterprising bus boy did, because the tarpaulin came only halfway down the sides of the pen and showed, in the light from the street lamp near it, a sodden Teddy bear. In the far corner Richard Mallory was as still as the shadow cast by the tarpaulin because, the doctor said just before he bustled him off to the hospital with Miss Rockett in attendance, he had been given a large dose of what seemed to be paregoric. In the final bottle the Damons had given him, and which he had thrown up in a kind of infant vengeance on Mr. Appleford's shoulder.

Dana Mallory had also been taken to the hospital, as a precautionary measure and to be near her son.

It was after one-thirty when Lou went to bed. Ingalls had said he would call and let her know how the baby was, and he did. Her phone rang at about two o'clock, when the doctors had concluded their examination, but the sentry in her mind had gone off duty for the first time in seventy-two hours, and at the sound of the phone she turned peacefully over on her face. At the other end of the wire Ingalls smiled, hung up and left the hospital and went back to bed.

The police had banked on the fact that Appleford would not have had time to make any elaborate disposal of the ransom money, and they were right. By nine o'clock the next morning it had been discovered in the non-allergic pillow the Applefords had brought with them, the foam rubber evidently gouged out in readiness and then stuffed back in. The Damons' station wagon had been found in the parking lot of a Bridgeport factory, and the description of the man and woman who had posed as the parents of a doll extended beyond the state.

Lou learned all this from the reporters who arrived in a swarm. One small link with the Heffernan case had already been established: one of Peter Veuchen's numerous temporary jobs had been as elevator operator in the building that housed Appleford's office. A cable had been sent to the Heffernans in Havana, and they would undoubtedly be returning.

Appleford's financial situation was disastrous under a sunny surface. All the answers were necessarily conjectural at this point, but his very occupation of tax consultant was suggestive. Clients with income to conceal could be and often were milked, and Appleford had apparently set up a false standard of living for himself and his cool, expensive wife. Irony lay in the fact that although Heffernan had obviously heard rumors of these activities he had done nothing beyond shunting his own friends away and dropping the Appleford acquaintance.

Appleford must have all but forgotten the existence of Veuchen's widow when, being met by Max at the train, he saw her on the station platform, watched her follow in a taxi, and guessed at her intention. The element of surprise was gone now, and the advantage his. Had he cut in back of the cabins near the woods and allowed himself deliberately to be glimpsed? Certainly the golf pro had seen the woman there and would mention it; Rosemary Damon, instinctively frightened at the appearance of a stranger, had made the best of a bad situation by remarking that the woman had just left Lou Fabian's cabin.

Opportunity for the murder of Mrs. Veuchen had always existed for most of these people; now that a relationship and a strong motive had been established, the building of a case against Appleford would commence.

If the police instead of Lou had found Veuchen's gun in her cabin, and Richard Mallory had not disgorged the milk; if the Damons had not improvised about Pavlow and forced the second inquiry which precipitated their flight ——

Reaction had set in, for Lou, which only went to show how thankless people were. A week ago, even three days ago, she would have said that to have the sword of doubt over her head removed, to have the small specter of Amy Heffernan dim a little with her real killer identified at last, would set her life completely to rights. Now it had happened, and all she felt was a bottomless depression. Some part of the last three days had not been nightmare, and the sudden and total release was not all bliss. It was like getting off a jet and climbing onto the corner bus.

Major Soames, urging his Hawaiian Night on any reporter who would listen, seemed dreamlike; so did the prospect of staying here at all. It might have been ten-thirty when the glass doors opened and three people came into the now-deserted lobby: Max and Ingalls and a small worried-looking man in a wrinkled brown suit.

Ingalls established himself against the far wall of the lobby and leaned there deliberately, gazing at Lou. He was smiling a little, and there was a faint flush across his cheekbones. Lou knew magically that when Max and the other man went away he was going to walk up to the barrier and say, as he had said that first time, "Anything for Ingalls?" but that this time he would not be looking down at her wrists.

Max, at the barrier, was scowling urgently at her. Lou, full of a happiness so sharp and sudden that it gave her goose flesh, went obediently forward. The frightened-looking little man was evidently an arriving guest; he was surrounded by a vast collection of expensive luggage, all of it initialed ——

Was it possible? It was, Lou thought, meeting the timid deerlike eyes and having trouble with the corners of her mouth, not only possible but inevitable. On the very edge of her vision Ingalls had folded his arms and composed himself to an unflickering gravity. She would not, could not look at him now.

"How do you do, Mr. Gifford?" she said.

END

UNFORGOTTEN

By JESSE STUART

What are the dreams within his white old head
Tottering down the street, tapping his cane
Where leaves are drifting golden, yellow, red?
Does he dream of a long-forgotten spring?

He must dream of a honeymoon long past,
Of her, red-lipped, blue-eyed with autumn hair;
He wonders why their springtime could not last
And why she had to go who was so fair.

Gone is her song and laughter he has known,
Her touch of hand and softly spoken word,
Each one a yellow leaf in the wind's wild moan.
Another spring returns now, he has heard

The sweetest sounds this side of paradise
Within the confines of his little world;
He stumbles on, for warm tears blind his eyes,
Another autumn leaf blown on the world.

Your hair has hidden highlights only egg can reach

Sense something healthy happen as your fingertips feel this protein-fresh lather – that's the first luxury of egg.

Only SHAMPOO PLUS EGG can give lather like this – lather that rinses instantly, completely, leaves hair radiant.

Feel first day control – no more "fly-away" hair! A touch of egg restores natural oils other shampoos strip away.

Know an inner glow of beauty – a radiance less luxurious shampoos can't match! It takes the magic touch of egg.

Hidden highlights come to life—a thousand thousand natural highlights yours only with the protein-fresh lather of Helene Curtis SHAMPOO PLUS EGG.

Gold Medal – the "flower" of the wheat – makes a "Flower" of a Pie!

Betty Crocker of General Mills, Inc.

New and very special! Betty Crocker's double-decker pie shows off two golden pastry shells . . . one filled with ice cream, one with strawberries. To be sure of tender, flaky crust . . . make it with dependable Gold Medal, the flour that always helps you bake it better, because it's the "flower" of the wheat . . . the finest part.

Pastry

- 1 1/2 cups sifted GOLD MEDAL Flour
- 3/4 tsp. salt
- 1/2 cup lard (or 1/2 cup plus 2 tbsp. hydrogenated shortening such as Spry, Crisco, Snowdrift, Swift'ning)
- 3 tbsp. water

Heat oven to 475° (very hot). Mix flour, salt. Cut in shortening. Sprinkle with water; mix with fork. Round into ball. Divide into two parts . . . ⅔ in one part, ⅓ in other. Roll larger part 1" larger than inverted 9" pie pan; smaller part ½" larger than inverted 6" pan. Ease into pans; flute and prick pastry. Bake 8 to 10 minutes or until golden brown. Cool.

Filling—Spoon 1 qt. softened ice cream into 9" baked pie shell. Make slight hollow in center. Place 6" baked pie shell securely in hollow. Fill with strawberries, sweetened to taste. Serve immediately.

Bake it Better with Gold Medal – the "Kitchen-tested" Flour

"...Between Jobs"

HOW AMERICA LIVES

1939. Kathy was a starlet. Hugh began his career with $25-a-day bit parts.

Hugh, out of work, got a part as Kathy's movie "husband" shortly before their marriage.

Hugh starred in 25 films—mostly B pictures, crime shows and Westerns.

"I'm a 'working actor,'" says Hugh, "not a big-name star." Kathy gave up acting when their first child arrived.

The Beaumonts of Hollywood suffer from the actor's chronic complaint: dry spells between movie, TV roles.

Hugh has appeared in many teleplays, and one—for the Loretta Young show—he coauthored.

He had feature billing in such pictures as The Blue Dahlia. Many of his old movies are shown on late TV.

"Right now, I'm the father in Leave it to Beaver. I'm proud to be part of this kind of entertainment."

By GLENN MATTHEW WHITE and HUGH BEAUMONT
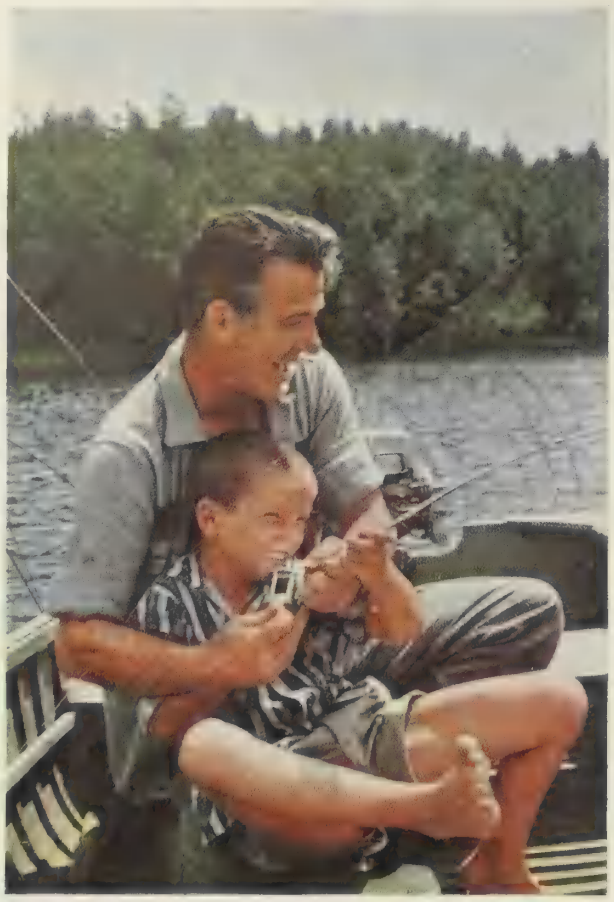
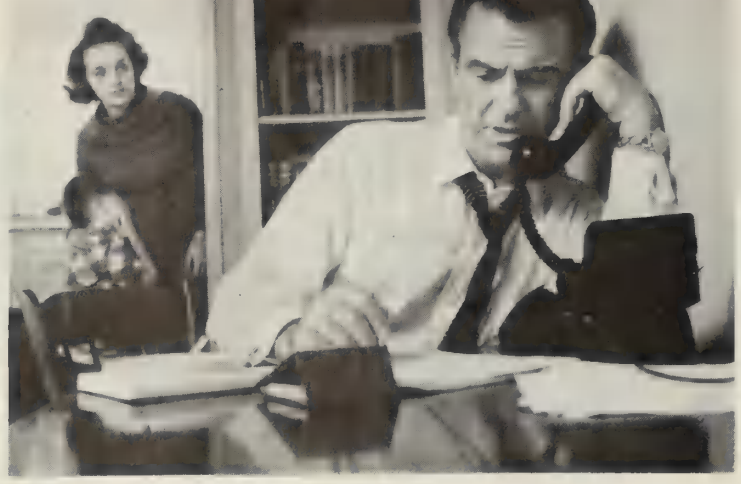
Photographs by DON ORNITZ



Here is Hollywood from a working actor's point of view—Hugh Beaumont speaking:



"We live in a ranch-type house that includes three bedrooms and a den, which we use as a fourth bedroom. We have three children—two boys and a girl. We drive two cars, one of them a two-year-old Chrysler station wagon, the other a seven-year-old Plymouth.

"My wife teaches part time in a most unusual private school, chiefly because she wants a wider range for creative expression than housework allows her. She thoroughly enjoys teaching when I am busy. She is miserable when I am not working because she is afraid I will become depressed sitting about the house alone.

"But no one is more miserable when I am not working than I myself. Actors have invented some nice phrases for it—we're 'at liberty,' or 'between jobs.' But the words don't conceal the problem. This is the time when you prowl the house, decide to write a novel, groan, and, if you're not careful, begin to snap at your wife and children.

"That was what I was doing just this time last year. Right now, of course, I am completing a thirty-nine-week contract as the "I'm unbearable when I'm waiting for the phone to ring, waiting for a new part." However, Hugh writes in some dull periods. He's also licensed to preach, and occasionally substitutes for a local minister.

"We would probably have a lot more money in the bank if we stayed in Hollywood instead of cavorting off to Minnesota."

"We can't really afford to stay up in Lonesome Water without an income, so we've started a Christmas-tree business. It should help pay for the children's college educations, and when they are grown, it may then support Kathy and me."

father in Leave it to Beaver, the TV show. The show is fun to do, and I am proud to be part of this kind of entertainment. If the welcome the show has received this year is any gauge of my fortunes, I should count on its going on forever. But I know that someday I'll be 'between jobs' again.

"Last summer, before my role in the Beaver show was certain, we set off for Lonesome Water, our haven in Northern Minnesota. Lonesome Water is a cottage, thirty by thirty-six feet, unfinished inside, on ninety-three wooded acres with frontage on two lakes in Itasca County. That's how it might be described in a real-estate ad. But to us it is much more than that. It is our refuge from Hollywood, our place for getting down to earth, for fishing and swimming and trying to be our true selves.

"Toward the end of the trip last July, I wondered how many jobs I was missing—whether it was all worth while. After twenty-five hundred miles of driving, my eyes were hot and heavy with fatigue.

"Then Kristan, aged eleven, spoke in her soft little voice: 'There's Porcupine Corner.' A moment later, Hunter announced

The rush to school and work starts at 6:30. Kristy and Hunter leave first; Kathy takes Mark to school later. When Kathy has time between their departures, she often meditates, dipping into a small book of prayers.

"Hollywood is a poor place for us to grow in resourcefulness and self-reliance."

Kathy has taught to provide tuition for the two youngest Beaumonts at a nearby private school. She, too, has preached—at 13 took her father's sermon notes and conducted the service for him.

"We want our children to grow up knowing how to live without the artificial stimulus of TV, parties, paid amusements."

in a voice that still cracks at times, 'There're the Three Sisters.' He pointed to three lofty Norway pines that stand in a clump by the side of the road.

"Mark, aged eight, said, 'Don't forget—it's my year to tell the turn.' He paused, forefinger raised high. Suddenly he lowered it. 'Right there!' he said, and pointed to a little side road that wanders off into the pines.

"When we reach that point, we top a last rise and enter a clearing. One lake lies to the left, another to the right, joined by a lazy, winding little stream that meanders through a meadow.

"Mark, the family extrovert, is nearly bursting with excitement. Dark-haired Hunter, our serious teen-ager, already has collected his possessions, has one hand on the door. Kristy, usually the quiet one, now with eyes shining, brown hair flying, hangs precariously from a car window. She points to the cottage eaves. 'Daddy, oh, daddy, look! The swallows! Dozens of them. They've built their nests up there. We can't pull them down!'

"We know that for the next few weeks the chatter of swallow family life will shatter the cool, gray quiet of the morning. Dreams

"We believe that we are body and spirit, and to develop both must live in a world of people, but we also must withdraw from time to time to feed the spirit. This was our reason for acquiring Lonesome Water."

"Kristy looked at the rough cottage, then at the lake. 'You know,' she said, 'I not only don't miss TV up here, I wouldn't want it at all. It would sort of spoil things.'"

"I've worked in many films I consider worthless. But I've found satisfaction in performing as well as I could, and in being able to provide for my family."

HOW AMERICA LIVES

"This is the place where I've seen Hollywood producers reduced to the size of normal human beings. . . . God doesn't measure us by the stardom we achieve."

"We've never wanted merely to live a normal life in Hollywood, but to achieve a unique life. We have, of course, failed more often than we like to remember. I know I am not a good man. I just try to be one."

of sleeping late vanish in the whir of swallow wings. It would be unthinkable to destroy the nests until the baby birds can fly.

"No matter about the swallows; or that the house sits too high off the ground; or that the storm shutters on the windows give it the appearance of being blind; or that the grass is knee high. One glimpse of Lonesome Water and all doubt is gone. We know that it is worth all effort."

The Beaumonts recognized their need for a place like Lonesome Water eleven years ago. Hugh explains it this way: "We believe that we are body and spirit; to develop both, we must live in a world of people, but we also must withdraw from time to time to feed the spirit. This is an essential part of our family philosophy, a so-called 'principle of alternation,' which I first read in a book by Dr. William Ernest Hocking when I was studying for the ministry."

Shortly after his marriage to Kathy in 1941, Hugh decided upon a drastic change in profession—to become a minister. He had had only one year of college. He knew he could not give up acting completely for the six undergraduate and postgraduate years which ministerial studies would take. So he attended classes at the University of Southern California, continued acting, and for four years served as pastor of the Vincent Methodist Church in Los Angeles, in one of the oldest, toughest neighborhoods of the city. He was supposed to do nothing but preach, but he found that stained-glass windows were being broken and Sunday-school children frightened away by gangs who waylaid them.

Hugh felt the answer would be to get the antagonistic groups together and show them there was no good reason for fighting. He organized athletic clubs for the boys, interest groups for the girls—basketball games, boxing, camera clubs and, of course, drama classes. At one time he had over 150 children in these youth groups.

He managed to juggle a heavy schedule of acting assignments, schoolwork and church work for several years. As the clubs grew, the load became too heavy, so he hired a seminary student to assist him and paid him his own $70 monthly church salary.

Even with this assistance, he began to have dizzy spells. While driving, he often had to pull out of traffic and stop the car in order to recover. His doctor warned him to stop trying to spread himself so thin. He was forced to give up the church work and, later, to withdraw from graduate school.

"I don't know whether I would have made a good minister," Hugh comments. "I like to remember, though, that in those years from 1943 to 1947 some boys under my direction began to play with basketballs instead of switchblade knives, and learned that color of skin has

CONTINUED ON PAGE 132

Dress by Jeanne D'Arc. Children's Dresses by Helen Lee.

only Sta-Flo® BEAUTY-STARCHES so easily

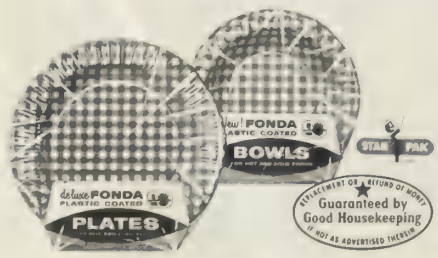
Naturally, America's most popular starch!

Serve in Style on



FONDA

paper plates

EXCLUSIVE CHINA-IZED™ surface defies grease and moisture. Both hot and cold foods taste better. Pressure-crimped rim adds strength. Try Fonda Sectional Plates, Bowls and Fonda Hot and Cold Cups, too.

FONDA PAPER PLATES

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 130

nothing to do with a person's being a good teammate."

He says, "I also preached a great many sermons, and I'm sure I learned more in the process than did any of my congregation."

Chuckling, he recalls one deeply serious sermon he preached during the war to a congregation made up largely of elderly women. He was decrying the fact that, in his opinion, "too much of modern-day Christianity had become a lavender-scented, pink-tea affair. The day of the Christian martyrs was gone!" "If a Nazi barricade were set up at the end of this block," he asked them, "how many of us would walk through the gunfire if this were necessary to prove our faith? Probably not one!"

Afterward, a little old lady, with birds perched on her hat, came up to shake hands. In a thin, fluttery voice, she asked, "Mr. Beaumont, how do you know we wouldn't face those guns?"

Suddenly Hugh could see her, bird-trimmed hat and all, tripping straight down the street into gunfire, like an elderly Pied Piper, closely followed by the other courageous, elderly women. The thought was tremendously humbling.

"I believe they'd have done it too!" he exclaims.

Many times he regrets that he did not finish his graduate work and become an ordained minister. He still holds a license to preach in the Methodist Church, and often does so when a minister is ill, or out of town on vacation. "There are few satisfactions quite as deep," he says, "as that when a listener comes up and says, 'Thank you, I needed that. I hadn't thought of it that way before.'"

Hugh began what he hoped would be the climb to movie stardom at the lowest rung short of extra, with $25-a-day bit parts. Slowly he progressed to longer and better roles. "I've been starred in at least twenty-five full-length films—most of them B pictures, crime shows and Westerns," he estimates.

"Many of them are still shown on late, late television, but I get no income from the TV rights. They are the sort of films almost everybody sees, but nobody notices." He had feature billing in such pictures as The Last Outpost, The Fallen Sparrow and The Blue Dahlia. Among his starring roles was that of Michael Shayne, detective, in the series by that name. The year before he was cast as the father in Leave it to Beaver, he had a role in Night Passage, with Audie Murphy and James Stewart, and in several other less notable films. He also appeared in teleplays—and one, for the Loretta Young Show, he coauthored.

Like all young actors, he approached his career with dreams of becoming a great star. He does not feel he has made it. "I have worked in many films I think are worthless," he admits. "This has been hard to accept, and yet I have found real satisfaction in performing as well as I could the parts that came my way and in providing for my family."

Kathy is his real-life star. Movie stardom never especially enticed her. She didn't want to come to Hollywood in the first place; she stayed most reluctantly.

They both laugh when they recall their first meeting. Each was a regional winner in the 1939 Gateway to Hollywood contest, a nationwide talent search for young people to appear on a C.B.S. network radio show. They had arrived for two weeks in Hollywood, all expenses paid: she, from St. Paul, Minnesota; he, from New Orleans, Louisiana.

They saw each other for the first time in the opulent surroundings of a Hollywood producer's office: deep rugs; a highly polished desk the size of a Ping-pong table; two impeccably dressed producers, one complete with a cigarette holder. In a very large chair sat Kathy. She was wearing a brown tweed traveling suit and brown pumps, one of them dangling loose from her heel. Sunlight streamed through the windows, turning her blond hair into gold. But otherwise Hugh thought she looked like a kitten that had been left out in the rain. Her complexion was greenish: she had come direct from the train, on which she had been thoroughly trainsick. Her first impression of Hugh was that he looked like a hick. "Probably," Hugh defends himself. "But I was smart enough to lead you down an aisle to the altar two years later on an Easter morning."

Kathy had never heard of Gateway to Hollywood until the head of the drama department at Hamline University, where she was a student, chose her to represent the school. To her great astonishment, she won in the St. Paul area. Only eighteen, she didn't feel she was ready for a screen career; she thought she ought to finish college first, but everyone told her this was her Big Opportunity. So she took the train to Los Angeles.

- DAVE, 29, loves to sail.
- HARRIETTE, 27, loves to swim.
- BABY PAUL, 21 months, loves their undivided attention.

They run a marine service in York Harbor, Maine, work while everyone else sails and swims, "and don't get a good look at the baby until Labor Day!"*

The Sea, the Sky AND $75 a Week

By EILEEN SHARPE and ARTURO F. GONZALEZ, JR.

HOW AMERICA LIVES

in the July JOURNAL

*They love the business they're in.—ED.

One of the producers of Gateway to Hollywood introduced them. "We're pairing you two on the show," he said. "I hope it's all right with you?"

"It's all right with me," Hugh said. "What's the reason?"

"Oh, we're pairing boys and girls from opposite regions of the country."

"That's a good region," Hugh answered thickly. "I mean reason," he amended, when Kathy, not smiling, turned gray-blue eyes on him.

She said it was all right with her, without enthusiasm.

Although they were finalists on Gateway to Hollywood, they weren't top winners. Something more important happened. They discovered they had many mutual interests besides acting. After their performance—a little horror play with Boris Karloff—Kathy was adopted as a protégée by the late Gregory La Cava, a well-known director in Hollywood. Upon his recommendation, she was signed by R.K.O.

Her first picture was Fifth Avenue Girl, with Ginger Rogers. Later she had a minor role in The Hunchback of Notre Dame and appeared with Joe Penner and Kay Kyser in their movies. When her contract with R.K.O. expired, La Cava recommended her to Universal, and she had parts in several Deanna Durbin films, a dozen or so B pictures, and in John Barrymore's last movie.

But Kathy didn't conform to the Hollywood pattern for starlets. On one occasion, bored cooling her heels while waiting for an important audition, she wandered off to play tennis. She was gaily batting balls when she heard herself being paged. She strolled to the set, perspiring slightly, still wearing soiled tennis shoes and a rumpled tennis costume. She didn't get the part.

When Jesse Lasky beamed on her and asked how she liked Hollywood, she answered honestly, "Not very much. I think I ought to go back to Minnesota and finish school." On several occasions she told producers they were making a big mistake buying trashy scripts when they could get many great classics absolutely free.

"Gee, you're lucky it's La Cava who's interested in you," another starlet told her. "At least he's a gentleman, not a wolf." Having been brought up in her father's parsonage in Crookston, Minnesota, Kathy was puzzled, but she could depend upon Hugh to supply all answers. "What kind of man is a wolf?" she asked him. She really wanted to know.

Kathy's career prospects were decidedly brighter than Hugh's when they decided to marry. He was broke, "between jobs" and without prospect of any. He had a mother and sister to support. Kathy's mother opposed the marriage (her father had died five years before). Nevertheless, they were determined to prove that "love is the most irresistible force in the world."

At the time Kathy had the role of a bride in a movie starring Irene Dunne. La Cava suggested, "Let's give Beaumont the part of the groom. Get a license and make it for real. We can advertise the picture as the first in which a real wedding ceremony takes place." The producer thought this was a terrific idea. Besides the part for Hugh, a gala wedding and the bride's trousseau, they would get "a lot of priceless publicity."

The proposition filled Kathy and Hugh with a kind of cold horror. They refused without a second thought. They were married before a small group of friends in the Mount Hollywood Congregational Church. They named their first child for the officiating minister, the Rev. Allan Hunter.

After the wedding, Hugh received a long letter from Kathy's older brother, a minister in Canton, Ohio. Among other things, he wrote: "Kathy has been reared in a deeply religious, not a pious home." Hugh, who had turned away from his own rigid fundamentalist-church upbringing, was deeply impressed. "It was Kathy who taught me that laughter, joy of living and even gaiety could be one with religion. Her God had no long face, no knobby forefinger.

"If I can put into words what this has meant in our family life," Hugh says, "it is that we've never wanted merely to live a normal life in Hollywood, but to achieve a unique life. Needless to say, we have failed more often than we like to remember.

"Hunter was the youngest atheist I ever knew. Almost from babyhood, he was asking difficult questions. 'Where is God?' And to the answer, 'Everywhere,' he asked, 'Then is He in the grass?' and to this answer, 'Yes, everywhere,' Hunter reasoned, 'Well then, we're walking on God when we walk on the grass.' At the age of eleven he had progressed to agnosticism and was still pretty doubtful, not only about God but about the entire field of Christian ethics. But last year after our long, exhausting drive home from Minnesota, it was Hunter who asked, 'Will one of you wake up to drive me to Sunday school in the morning?'"

Mark is still at an age when he needs parental reminders that the world of films and TV is not real life. He came in for dinner one day,

CONTINUED ON PAGE 134

EGGS produced by chickens weren't very popular in America until around 1825. In fact, our forefathers preferred the eggs of wild fowl. Chickens were raised primarily for their feathers, which were used to stuff mattresses and pillows. When wild fowl became scarce, chicken eggs became popular. Today, eggs are so popular that Americans eat 168 million of them a day; and like most of the foods we enjoy, eggs taste even better with Morton Salt.

Any egg worth its salt is worth Morton's

When it rains it pours

New! Flip-up shaker top added
Now shakes and pours.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 132

breathing hard, followed by Miskie, their fat black Labrador retriever. "I just had a big fight with Alan," he announced loudly. "He started it, and I finished it."

Neither Kathy nor Hugh said anything.

Mark breathed harder and louder. "He started it, and I finished it!" His posture defied anybody to deny it.

"So what happened?" Hugh asked.

"He took Miskie's ball and wouldn't give it back—that's what happened." Miskie, lying in the center of the kitchen, raised her head at the mention of her name.

"Is that all?"

"Yes. He got 'gressive, so I got 'gressive back—just like you said," Mark told his parents.

Kathy couldn't suppress a ripple of laughter. It was a line Hugh had in the Leave it to Beaver show they had watched the night before. In the scene Beaver—who is just Mark's age—had a black eye. Father, obviously pleased, told him the only answer to aggressiveness is aggressiveness in return.

"Alan got 'gressive first," Mark pointed out, "then I got 'gressive."

Mark was making such a big production of this, Hugh wondered if Kathy put him up to it. She certainly had not, she said.

"You know, Mark," Hugh said, "there's nothing smart, nothing real great, about fighting, don't you?"

"Yes," Mark said, subdued.

"Almost always there is a better way?"

"Yes."

Kathy interposed: "And you don't think what your father does in films is really real-real life, do you?"

"Of course he doesn't," Hugh said. "I've explained it to him several times."

"Yes—but I want to make certain he knows that you don't necessarily mean what you say on television. You understand he doesn't mean what he says, don't you, Mark?"

"Course he doesn't," Mark agreed, sidling out with Miskie trailing him.

"You can't blame Mark particularly," Hugh admits. "In my Mike Shayne detective series I ate peanuts in almost every scene. I had to eat peanuts during rehearsals, blocking, takes, retakes and close-ups too. I ate an awful lot of peanuts. When I met people who knew I played the part, they invariably asked, 'Do you really like peanuts so much?' Why should I like peanuts? I hate peanuts. But I'm still not sure anybody believed me when I told them so."

When it's practical to do so, the Beaumonts believe in sharing problems with the children. All three youngsters realize that the Beaumont phone is a business instrument, for example, and that they must keep telephone conversations short. Fifteen-year-old Hunter calls his close pal, Bob: "Hi! Can ya come over? . . . Yep! . . . Yep! . . . Naw. O.K. See ya. Gubbye!"

The children have well-defined responsibilities—making their own beds, keeping their rooms straight and sharing the dishwashing. To avoid arguments, they have evolved a system of their own, working separately, one clearing, one washing, one wiping. This also permits each to view his favorite TV show.

Hunter keeps the lawn trim. Kristy sets the dinner table, makes the salads and is learning to cook. Each feeds the dog, one week at a time, and all are expected to help with any given family project, such as putting in a new lawn or cleaning out the garage. They are not paid for these chores. They do get a regular weekly allowance—two dollars for Hunter, a dollar for Kristy, and twenty-five cents for Mark—but the work they do is a contribution to the family as a going concern.

Kathy at 6:30 in the morning is first out of bed. Wrapped in a housecoat, her hair pulled back in a pony tail, she pads into the kitchen, busies herself cutting grapefruit, making coffee, frying bacon and eggs.

Hunter, in yellow cotton shirt and bright blue slacks, emerges, his hair sleekly brushed. Kristy, wakened by her own chiming alarm, has dressed, knotted a little blue scarf around her neck to match her blue skirt and to set off a clean white blouse. They eat their breakfasts on the pull-out shelves from the ash-wood cabinet counter. Different buses will pick them up at the corner, Hunter at 8, Kristy at 7. Mark goes to Oakwood School, where Kathy teaches; Kristy goes to junior high, Hunter to Van Nuys Senior High School.

The hour between 7 and 8 in the morning is Kathy's quiet time. Hugh may depart at 7 if on early call; if not, he can sleep till 8. Kathy often uses this interval for a bit of ironing, but oftener she reads and meditates, dipping into her collection of prayer books.

Then she calls Mark and dresses herself while he scrambles into his clothes. While he prepares his own school lunch, Kathy cooks his breakfast. He eats and returns to pull his bedclothes into place. The surface effect, at least, is smooth. On the days that Kathy does not take her turn driving in the school car pool, Mark is picked up at the house by another school mother.

On other days, Kathy departs with him on a pickup round. She may leave a few of the dishes for Hugh to wash on his "late call" or free days. No matter when Hugh rises, he has only one request: "Don't talk to me. I don't want to talk!" In a semicoma, he takes his plate of breakfast to the dinette table and buries himself in the paper. He estimates he needs an hour and a half to wake up.

Kathy gave up her acting career without regret when Hunter arrived in 1943, but she did regret not finishing college. So when Mark was school age, she tucked her textbooks under her arm too. Teaching credentials, she thought, would be a kind of insurance, although she didn't expect to begin teaching immediately. But shortly after finishing her college work, Kathy became interested in Oakwood, a nearby private school. When she was asked to teach English classes there part time, freeing the director for administrative duties, she took the opportunity to earn tuition for Kristy and Mark.

The Beaumont home, on a narrow lot in North Hollywood, is twenty-five years old and vaguely ranch house in style. They bought it in 1949 for $9900. Hugh was "between jobs" at SPAM ITALIAN LOAF. Hot 'n' hearty! Cut into slices but not way through, loaf of french bread. Butter every 2 slices. Sprinkle SPAM slices with garlic salt, oregano; top with slices of Mozzarella cheese. Thrust into loaf to form sandwiches. Spoon tomato sauce over SPAM and cheese. Heat loaf in 400° oven 15 to 20 minutes.

SPAM-BOATS. Fun to launch at a party! Slit unsliced wiener buns lengthwise, across top. Butter . . . then tuck in all kinds of good things: cheese, egg slices, lettuce frills, tomato quarters . . . and of course, rosy triangles of tender SPAM, the meat that gives you sweet juicy pork and mild tender ham in a matchless blend.

Which SPAMwich is top winner?

These are the three winning SPAMwiches, as indicated in a recent survey. But which one ranked first? (Answer below)

SMÖRGÅSBORD SPAMWICH. Inspired by the fabulous open-face sandwiches of Copenhagen. Makes a "has-everything" luncheon sandwich or party snack. Spread buttered rye bread with softened cream cheese. Top one slice with anchovy fillets, stuffed olive rings. Top second slice with flavory slices of SPAM, then a generous dollop of mustard-spiked mayonnaise. Serve with varied and pretty garnishes . . . all the plate can possibly hold!

THE WINNER: flavory "Spam Italian Loaf" was first, followed closely by perky "Spam-boats" and then by Danish-inspired "Smörgåsbord Spamwich". Three good ways to enjoy a Spamwich. Try them all!

What's SPAM made of? Nothing but sweet juicy pork and mild tender ham . . . carefully selected, superbly seasoned.

SPAM is the registered trademark for a pure pork product packed only by Geo. A. Hormel & Co., general offices Austin, Minnesota, U.S.A.

THE ONE AND ONLY

SPAM

...MEAT OF 1,000 USES!

Also marketed in Canada

HORMEL

the time, but managed to borrow $1500 from a bank without collateral to make the down payment. Three years ago, between jobs again, he started a do-it-yourself remodeling project on the house that got completely out of hand. Kathy's brother, a contractor, came to his assistance. With some hired help they stripped the house, wrapped it for stucco, installed forced-air heating and new plumbing, converted three small bedrooms into two large ones and a bathroom, made the living room larger by enclosing the front porch, added 500 square feet comprising two new bedrooms, a breakfast room and a second bathroom, and changed the den into a kitchen. Kathy and two sisters-in-law did all the scraping of woodwork, papering, painting and finishing of cabinets—a six-week job.

"With the help of neighbors and several interested bystanders, we poured sixteen square yards of concrete to make a patio in the back yard. Our do-it-yourself project cost nearly $11,000. I spent $2500 in cash and borrowed $8000 to do it, and I'm not going to do it again," Hugh declares.

"If I suddenly made $100,000 we wouldn't live much differently than we do now, except that I would like to buy an island in Minnesota we saw for sale at $16,500. And I'd build a house somewhere for my mother."

No one has a right to say to another: "Because we belong to each other as we do, I have a right to know all your thoughts." Not even a mother may treat her child in that way. All demands of this sort are foolish and unwholesome. In this matter, giving is the only valuable process; it is only giving that stimulates. Impart as much as you can of your spiritual being to those who are on the road with you, and accept as something precious what comes back to you from them.

ALBERT SCHWEITZER
Memoirs of Childhood and Youth
Published by The Macmillan Company

A working actor's income seesaws dizzily, as much as from $5000 a year to $50,000 the next. Hugh's income dipped low in 1948 when TV was in its infancy and the motion-picture industry, frightened by box-office drops, curtailed production. Even now, Hugh's annual income may be doubled or halved from one year to the next.

"Such variations are partly the result of a kind of tightrope-walking act in which the free-lance actor must constantly engage. If he sets his minimum salary too low he may work a lot for a time and then suddenly find himself unemployed because he has become an 'old face' [seen too much]. On the other hand, if he demands too great a salary, he may also find that he has priced himself out of the market," Hugh says. "I found, a couple of years ago, that a thousand dollars a week with a three-week guarantee was about right for me."

Another difficulty for an actor is the fact that when he is not working, he can do nothing but wait for a call from his agent. "All casting," Hugh explains, "is done through licensed artists' representatives, or agents. This arrangement is a matter of practical necessity. A single agent may represent from twenty-five to, in a few cases, a hundred clients. Anyone casting can consider in the course of a few phone calls literally hundreds of actors for the parts he has to fill. Though of obvious advantage to the casting offices, it is a short road to insanity for the actor who has unaccountably 'hit a dry spell.'"

This year, with a part in a weekly TV show, Hugh will wind up in a high-income bracket. Last year, income was discouragingly uncertain. Because of these variations, the Beaumonts have a system rather than a budget. One inviolable rule: they buy nothing on time, except house and car. They live in a house which they can afford, considering taxes and mortgage payments as well as upkeep. Since taxes, insurance and Hugh's agent's fees consume almost 30 per cent of their income, this rule makes sound and sobering sense.

When they have more money, they can spend it on "less necessary things"—on music lessons for the children, fancier meals, clothes and entertainment. Hugh provides his own wardrobe while on a job. Suits must be good ones that cost at least $125, even if he can't afford them.

This past year, more flush, and with more partying required because of Leave it to Beaver, Kathy has spent $500 on clothes. But she still looks for bargains at good neighborhood shops and was delighted to find "a little basic black" suit-dress with huge white faille collar, reduced to $40. She splurged $69.95 on a red lace evening dress for a gala Christmas function (it served all through the holidays), and $12.95 for evening pumps. She bought in all, five pairs of shoes costing from $6.95 to $12.95, at the outlet store where she buys all her shoes—"Not this season's, but still nice."

Her new black wool cape that cost $69.95 attracts more glances in Hollywood than mink, which she can't afford. The $500 total included everything from hosiery, belts, scarfs to sweaters and skirts and a $20 bathing suit for Hollywood pools. She never goes to a hairdresser.

Every week Kathy cashes a $40 check at the supermarket. Out of this she buys weekly groceries, the gas for her car, gives Hunter and Kristy lunch money (35 cents a day apiece), and all allowances. A monthly $30 for eggs and milk is over and above this. Telephone bills are high, $16 to $20 a month. Utilities are moderate.

But financial uncertainty is the lesser of the problems the Beaumonts face "between jobs." Hugh's main concern is what to do with his time. Among other things, he has tried writing—with remarkable success.

"Thousands of words—I have no idea how many—went into the wastebasket before I made my first sale, to The Saturday Evening Post," he recalls, "and more uncounted thousands went the same way before I had the thrill of seeing my story, A Thing to Remember, in

You can't taste the difference, but

Sucaryl makes it lots easier to cut down calories

WEIGHT WATCHER'S CHOCOLATE CHIFFON PIE

½ tsp. oil
½ c. shredded coconut
⅓ c. cold water
1 tbsp. gelatin
2 tbsp. Sucaryl solution
¼ tsp. salt
1 tsp. vanilla
1 square (1 oz.) unsweetened chocolate
¼ cup boiling water
2 egg yolks
½ c. nonfat dry milk solids
½ c. ice water
⅛ tsp. cream of tartar

Brush 8-inch pie plate with oil; coat sides and bottom with coconut. Set aside. To cold water, add gelatin, Sucaryl, salt, vanilla; set aside. Melt chocolate in double boiler; add boiling water; cook and stir until smooth; remove from heat. Add unbeaten egg yolks; stir until blended. Add gelatin mixture; stir until smooth. In chilled bowl, beat milk solids with ice water and cream of tartar on high speed until stiff peaks form. Add chocolate mixture slowly while beating on low speed. Pour into pie plate. Chill until set. Serves 6.

FREE—Our new cookbook, "Calorie-saving Recipes with Sucaryl," including dozens of new kitchen-tested ideas for desserts, beverages, sauces, dressings . . . 50 wonderful recipes in all! Get your free copy at your drug store.

Sucaryl simply says you don't have to trim portions to trim calories. No compromising your taste, either . . . any dish sweetened with calorie-free Sucaryl tastes just like its sugar-sweetened twin.

You use Sucaryl practically anywhere you would sugar. In tablet form, to sweeten your coffee, tea or any other hot drink. In solution, for fruits and cereals, for cold drinks, and for cooking and baking.

Sucaryl, of course, is for anyone sensibly counting calories, and for those who for any other reason can't use sugar. Low-salt diets call for Sucaryl Calcium. Abbott Laboratories, North Chicago, Illinois and Montreal, Canada. Abbott

New Table Bottle At Drug Stores Everywhere

Sucaryl®

Non-caloric Sweetener—No Bitter Aftertaste

SENSATIONALLY DIFFERENT!...
BUILT-IN COMFORT

Dr Scholl's
ARCHLIFT® Sandals

Enjoy the foot freedom of a sandal, yet more restful support than the finest shoe can give you! The exclusive built-up arch and cupped heel cradle your every step . . . make walking a real pleasure . . . prevent that 'letdown' feeling of ordinary sandals. Ideal casual footwear for home, street or recreation. Finest quality leather.

WOMEN'S: Tan, Red, White, Black
MEN'S: Tan, Brown, Black
$9.95

CHILDREN'S:
Tan, Red, White
from $6.95

MOLDED SOLE ▪ BUILT-UP ARCH ▪ CUPPED HEEL

At all Dr. Scholl Foot Comfort Shops, leading Shoe & Dept. Stores. If not available locally, write Dr. Scholl's, Inc., Dept. 61J, Chicago, Ill.

STIFF AND SORE
FROM WEEKEND ATHLETICS?

PUT MUSCULAR ACHES AND PAINS TO SLEEP
FAST

NEW Intracel
JEL
PENETRATING ANALGESIC

Penetrates like an injection!
Unlike searing liniment or salves, INTRACEL penetrates into aching muscles, to put pain to sleep where it hurts! Within 30 seconds, INTRACEL starts taking its analgesic and anesthetic ingredients through the skin to relieve stiff neck, shoulder and other muscular pain due to exertion. If your druggist does not have INTRACEL, send his name and address, with your own, to INTRACEL, Box 64515, Dept. H, Los Angeles 64, Calif., and we will send you a sample of INTRACEL, absolutely free!

Intracel
LIQUID OR JEL
2-oz., $1.49
Liquid in 6-oz. Economy size, $2.98

VCA LABORATORIES, LOS ANGELES AND NEW YORK

the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL in January of this year. Although I have many more rejections than sales, I keep trying to write when I have the time—not much, recently."

Fortunately for Hugh, Kathy, an experienced actress, fully understands that movie acting is hard, demanding, nerve-racking work—enough to produce neuroses if the waiting between jobs doesn't do it. Hugh answers "seven-thirty calls for eight" these days, which means he must be on the set in wardrobe and make-up by 8 o'clock. Shooting goes on some days until 7 in the evening. And it's a long tense day, the director barking orders, the stage crew bustling, muffed lines, nerves on raw edge, tempers sometimes flaring, even among the amiable Beaver cast and crew. With one day for reading rehearsals, one day for line rehearsals and blocking out action (fixing positions from which lines will be spoken), and three days of shooting, it takes a week to film a twenty-six-minute Beaver episode.

"We hope Beaver lasts for years," Hugh says, "but we don't know that it will. Our child star, Jerry Mathers, will grow up. And after Beaver, what? That is the gamble every actor takes. Kathy and I have never attempted to draw a blueprint of our future, saying, 'In five years we will be at this point; in ten years, this is our goal.' Instead, we try to look around us and say, 'What values are at hand and what can we do with them?' We remind ourselves that money is a means to an end rather than an end in itself.

"The real end is growth through an increasing awareness that God lives both in and around us. This conviction is strengthened and deepened for us in the beauty and peace of Lonesome Water.

"It is here that the children have learned to listen to a different kind of music than they hear in the city . . . the wind playing on its great pipe organ of pine trees. Here I have watched Kathy return from an early-morning walk with the natural beauty of her face enhanced by an inner light . . . she has seen a scarlet tanager and it spoke to her. This is the place where I have stood upon a crude log bridge and, in the mellow green water beneath, have watched until I have seen time stand still and Hollywood producers shrink to the size of ordinary human beings. 'Between jobs' becomes a very different thing at Lonesome Water."

COOK, FREEZE AND TREASURE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 71

to taste—enough sauce for one loaf. But don't try to freeze the sauce—the mayonnaise will separate. Each loaf makes 10 servings.

"The eye, can it feast when the stomach is starving?
Pray, less of your gilding and more of your carving!"

Fortunately, for all its "gilding," this ROAST DUCKLING PIQUANT needs no carving at all—it is quartered before it is roasted, and comes to the table all ready to serve to a crowd. The secret of its goodness is simple: while it roasts, you prick the skin with a fork, freeing golden juices to bubble out and baste the bird, and pouring off excess fat as the meat cooks down to lean, savory tenderness.

Have your butcher quarter 3 young ducklings. Arrange in an open roasting pan and bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 1½ or 2 hours, depending on the weight and the youth of the birds. Turn frequently and prick the skin even more frequently to make sure all the fat gets out. While the ducks are roasting, cut up 3 green peppers, 3 carrots and 3 stalks celery. Sauté about 3 minutes in a little fat you have poured off the ducklings. Then add 8 or 9 sprigs parsley, 3 tablespoons lemon juice, 4½ cups consommé and 18–20 fillets of anchovy, drained. Cover and simmer until vegetables are tender, then strain them from the broth. Remove ducklings from oven and drain on absorbent paper toweling. Thicken the broth with 6 tablespoons cornstarch moistened with a little water, and, if you like, flavor with cognac. Taste for salt—though we think the anchovies will season it enough. Place ducklings in the sauce and cool. Pack in 2 large containers or in a large casserole, and freeze. This recipe will serve 12.

On the afternoon of the party, take the duck from the freezer, place it in a foil-covered pan, and let it thaw in a slow oven while you run errands or polish silver. When guests arrive, simply remove the foil and turn up the heat for final crisping and browning. (Since cornstarch sauce thins slightly on freezing, you might want to thicken it a little when reheating.) If there's any duck left over—and frankly, we doubt it!—you can reheat it deliciously in its sauce for the gourmets in your own family.

Many people believe that a dusting of curry powder, all by itself, makes any dish a "curry." Not true of this tempting MEAT BALL CURRY—six aromatic spices give it a truly exotic Indian flavor. Because it freezes wonderfully and is such delightful party fare, we suggest making it as often as possible.

Chop 1 onion fine, and brown in 3 tablespoons shortening or salad oil in a heavy skillet. Mix 3 tablespoons curry powder with ⅛ teaspoon each of the following spices: coriander, cumin seed, dry mustard, ginger, mace, cloves; and 1 clove garlic, crushed or finely minced. Stir in ¼ cup water to make a rather thin paste, and add to the onions. Stir constantly to prevent burning, but let the mixture get nice and brown before you scrape it from the skillet and set aside.

For the meat balls: Crumble 2 slices bread into a little water. Squeeze out excess water and add to 2 pounds ground round beef. Season with 2 teaspoons salt and ¼ teaspoon pepper. Mix thoroughly and shape into 36 small meat balls. Brown well on all sides in hot shortening or salad oil. Then add one 8-ounce can tomato sauce, 1½ cups water, 1 teaspoon salt, and the browned spices and onions. Blend until smooth; cover and simmer about an hour. Add a little water occasionally so there will be plenty of gravy, since you will be serving the curry with rice. Cool well before packing into containers to freeze. To serve: Thaw partially at room temperature, and reheat in a covered double boiler—or use a covered roaster in a slow oven, stirring occasionally.

The curry is wonderful served with currant rice—just steam and plump a handful of currants and toss them in with freshly cooked rice. You can let your imagination run wild in dreaming up various interesting condiments for the curry. We like chutney, toasted coconut chips or shreds, and chopped egg mixed with minced green onions and crumbled bacon. Makes 5 servings.

Nothing shall be impossible to the woman who knows how to cry in the right way, in front of the right man. WINIFRED V. KNOCKER

If you own a freezer, the chances are you keep a supply of commercial ice cream on hand. But for extra-special occasions, it's much more fun to make an ice cream or sherbet yourself—perhaps a smooth-textured pineapple dessert, delicately balanced between sweetness and tartness.

FROZEN PINEAPPLE DESSERT: Beat 3 egg yolks with a dash of salt and ½ cup sugar until light, thick and lemon-colored, adding the sugar a tablespoon or so at a time and beating well after each addition. Drain the juice from a 9-ounce can crushed pineapple. Mix the syrup with 2 tablespoons lemon juice and add to egg and sugar. Heat in the top of a double boiler over gently simmering water, stirring until it coats the spoon like any custard. Add the crushed pineapple and cool. Make a meringue with 3 egg whites and 2 tablespoons sugar; beat 1 cup heavy cream until smooth and glossy. Fold the cream into the custard, then fold in the meringue. Pour into freezing trays and freeze until firm, then pack in containers and store in the freezer. This makes 1 quart.

The old-fashioned jelly roll has turned fancy in recent years—and perhaps the very fanciest variation on the old theme is this dark, rich chocolate roll, dusted with powdered sugar and filled with frothy chocolate mousse.

CHOCOLATE MOUSSE ROLL. First make the mousse filling. In the top of a double boiler melt 1½ cups semisweet chocolate bits with ⅓ cup sugar and ¼ cup water. While it melts, stir until smooth and free of lumps. Remove from heat and cool, stirring from time to time. When cool, add the yolks of 5 eggs which have been beaten until thick and lemon-colored, as for sponge-cake. Stir in 2 teaspoons vanilla. Beat the 5 egg whites until stiff enough to hold a peak when the beater is withdrawn. Add the chocolate-egg mixture to the whites and beat with a rotary beater just long enough to incorporate all the whites. Chill to spreading consistency in the refrigerator—about 3 to 4 hours.

For the roll: Sift together 3 times: 6 tablespoons cake flour, 6 tablespoons cocoa, ¼ teaspoon salt and ¾ teaspoon baking powder. Separate 4 eggs, and beat whites until they form soft peaks. Fold in ¾ cup sugar, a tablespoon at a time. Now beat the 4 egg yolks until very thick and lemon-colored. Add 1 teaspoon vanilla and fold in the egg-white-and-sugar meringue. Next, carefully fold in the sifted dry ingredients. Grease a shallow jelly-roll pan 10″ x 15″ x ½″. Line with greased waxed paper. Pour in batter and spread out evenly; bake in a hot oven, 400° F., for 13 minutes. Turn out on tea towel sprinkled with confectioners' sugar. Quickly cut off crisp edges of the cake. Roll up. Cool on rack. Unroll and spread generously with the chocolate mousse. Roll up again. Chill in refrigerator 1 hour before wrapping in aluminum foil and freezing. Before serving, thaw in refrigerator 2–3 hours—and remember that the roll slices better if it is left in the refrigerator until just before serving time.

You may have made the distressing discovery that your favorite desserts made with gelatin—Bavarian creams, blancmange—simply can't be frozen successfully. If so, our luscious orange cream will prove a fine surprise: it's delicate and fluffy, and guaranteed to unmold in perfect form!

ORANGE RICE RING. Cook 1 cup rice in boiling salted water until tender, about 18 minutes. Stir gently from time to time, using a fork instead of a spoon. Drain well. While the rice is cooking, mix together in a saucepan ¾ cup sugar, 1 cup orange juice, and 1½ tablespoons grated orange rind. Stir in the rice, and heat together gently until the rice has absorbed most of the liquid, stirring now and then. This takes 15–20 minutes. Beat 3 eggs slightly and spoon a little hot rice into the eggs. Then stir this into the remaining rice, and heat for about 2 minutes, stirring constantly. Cool 1 hour. Whip ½ cup heavy cream, add 1 teaspoon vanilla, and fold into the cooled rice mixture. Pour into a 1-quart mold. If the mixture seems too thin at this point, let it stand at room temperature awhile longer. Wrap well in aluminum foil. Freeze. Before serving, thaw slightly—then dip quickly in warm water and unmold onto serving plate. Top with toasted almonds and garnish with fresh orange sections. Makes 4 servings. END says Betty Himes, housewife from Birmingham, Michigan . . .

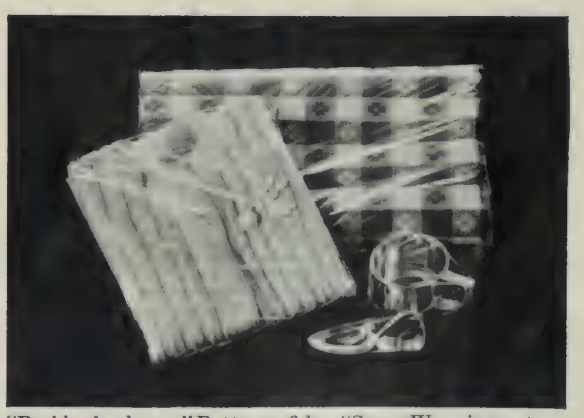
"Picnic foods travel beautifully in Saran Wrap"

"I honestly think I use Saran Wrap* for picnics because I can see what I've packed before I unwrap it," smiles Betty Himes, busy housewife and mother of three. "And, of course, nothing protects foods quite like Saran Wrap. And nothing saves like Saran Wrap, either." *Trademark

"Our picnic favorite—potato salad—stays so fresh and so protected in Saran Wrap. It's a great bowl cover!"

"I make my hamburger patties ahead of time. They won't stick together—if you use Saran Wrap to separate them."



"And deviled eggs never form a crust—even if made the night before. Saran Wrap keeps them beautifully."

"Cheese won't dry out in Saran Wrap," reports Betty, "it's moisture proof. Radishes and celery stay crisp, too."

"Cut watermelon ahead of time. It won't lose its flavor. Saran Wrap keeps it just right! Air can't get through."

"Besides food uses," Betty confides, "Saran Wrap is great for protecting other things like woolens, silver, linens."

DOW

The Dow Chemical Company,
Midland, Michigan

TWO FINE PRODUCTS OF STANDARD BRANDS INC.

The abundance of morning-fresh vegetables and greens offers Kathy a tempting variety to choose from.

ORNITZ

Family Favorites with a difference

HOW AMERICA LIVES

The accent on foreign flavor and emphasis on price.

By JANE ENGEL

From a collection of German and Swedish recipes, passed on to her by her mother, Kathy Beaumont now has an ever-growing "foreign favorites" file.
Here are five tempting ways to bring a foreign flavor to your table.

This "meal-in-itself" dish is spicy and delectable. Both inexpensive and substantial, it is rich with bits of ham and subtle seasonings. Serve it with a crisp, green salad, French bread and a refreshing dessert.

BELLA'S CREOLE BEANS: Wash and pick over 1 pound pinto beans. (If you are a Westerner, use California pink beans. They are not generally available on the East Coast.) Put beans in a large kettle and pour 2½ quarts boiling water over them. Then add 2 pounds smoked ham hocks or a 2–3-pound ham butt. Cover and boil for 15 minutes. Lower heat and simmer for about 2 hours or until beans are tender. In a skillet, sauté until crisp 4 slices bacon. Remove bacon and drain on paper toweling. Set aside for garnish. Add 1 cup minced onions and 3 cloves garlic, minced, to the bacon fat. Sauté until golden. Remove onion and add to beans. If there are not 2 tablespoons fat left in skillet, add a little butter to make up the difference. Stir in 2 tablespoons flour and cook slowly, stirring constantly, until you have a brown roux. Add to the beans. Season with ¼ cup chopped parsley, 2 teaspoons salt, ½ teaspoon thyme, 1 bay leaf and a little pepper. Cook for another 20 minutes. Add more water if it is too thick. Garnish with crumbled bacon. Makes 6 servings.

cost... $1.18

A luscious white cake with a "difference," it is baked with poppy seeds throughout. Kathy fills it with a creamy custard filling and sprinkles the top with sifted confectioners' sugar. A Hungarian favorite, it will be special to you too.

POPPY-SEED CAKE (Hungarian): Soak ⅔ cup poppy seeds in ¾ cup milk for 2 hours. Cream ⅔ cup butter until soft. Gradually add 1½ cups sugar, beating constantly. Sift and measure 2 cups flour. Resift with 2½ teaspoons baking powder and ½ teaspoon salt. Stir ¼ cup milk and 1 teaspoon vanilla into poppy-seed-milk mixture. Add the flour mixture in three parts alternately with the poppy-seed-milk to the batter, beating after each addition only until blended. Beat 4 egg whites until stiff, but not dry. Fold into the batter. Turn into 2 greased and floured 9″ cake pans. Bake in a moderately hot oven, 375° F., for 25 minutes. Remove from pans and cool. Fill with lemon-custard filling and sift confectioners' sugar over the top.

cost... $1.01

LEMON-CUSTARD FILLING: Mix 1 teaspoon cornstarch with ⅓ cup sugar. Cream together with 2 tablespoons butter or margarine. Add 3 well-beaten egg yolks and ⅔ cup milk. Pour into top of double boiler and cook over hot water, stirring constantly until the mixture thickens. Add a pinch of salt, 1 teaspoon grated lemon rind and ½ teaspoon vanilla. Cool. Spread between poppy-seed-cake layers.

cost... 21¢

Costs based on New York City supermarket prices as of April, 1958.

STUART

Amo's Chinese dish: rich with tender slices of beef, plump tomatoes and green peppers, served with fluffy rice tossed with garden peas, and a crisp salad.

A hurry-up dish certain to please all—Kathy especially serves it on days when she teaches. This recipe, given by a friend, makes an ideal buffet-supper main course—just double the quantity, serve plenty of hot steaming rice, a hearty tossed salad, and pass fresh fruit for dessert.

AMO'S CHINESE DISH: Cut 1½ pounds round steak across the grain in paper-thin slices. This is easier to do if the meat is frozen first. Place the meat in a bowl and pour over it a mixture of ⅓ cup soy sauce and 1 teaspoon sugar. Let it marinate for ½ hour, turning the meat after the first 15 minutes. Meanwhile, cut 3 large, peeled, firm tomatoes into eighths and cut 2 seeded green peppers into julienne strips, about 1½" long. In a large skillet, heat ¼ cup salad oil. Add 1 clove garlic and ¾ teaspoon ginger and cook for a few minutes. Remove the garlic. Add the green pepper and sauté, stirring constantly, for 3 minutes; then the beef and its liquid and cook for another 3 minutes. Add tomatoes and cover. Simmer a few minutes until tomatoes are hot. Blend 2 teaspoons cornstarch with 2 tablespoons soy sauce. Gently stir into the mixture and cook 1 more minute. Remove from heat. Makes 6 servings.

cost... $1.89

Toss crisp lettuce with a hot sweet-sour dressing, sprinkle with crumbled bacon and minced egg and you have the Beaumonts' favorite salad—wilted lettuce. An old German recipe given to Kathy by her mother. The secret, she says, is not to get the lettuce too wilted.

WILTED LETTUCE SALAD (German): Hard-cook an egg. Remove shell and, with a fork, crumble the egg. Prepare ⅓ cup minced Bermuda onion. In a skillet, sauté 3 bacon strips, diced, until crisp. Drain on paper toweling. Cool the bacon fat in the skillet slightly. Stir in 3 tablespoons sugar and ¼ cup vinegar. Cook, slowly, until very hot. Immediately pour over a head of lettuce that has been washed and broken up for the salad. Sprinkle with the crumbled bacon, egg and minced onion. Toss and serve. Makes 4–6 servings.

cost... 35¢

The Swedish call it Kaldolmar—we call it stuffed cabbage. This dish suits the Beaumonts to perfection. With its always-available ingredients and low cost, it has become a much-cherished dinner dish.

KALDOLMAR (Swedish Cabbage Rolls): Gently remove 12 large cabbage leaves from a large head. Simmer in about 2" boiling water, covered, for 5 minutes. Drain. Spread out ready for filling. Have ready ½ cup cooked rice. Mix 1½ pounds ground beef and ½ pound ground pork. Season with 1 teaspoon salt, ½ teaspoon allspice and a dash of pepper. Sauté 1 onion, minced fine. Add the onion, rice and 1 egg, slightly beaten, to the meat. Mix well. Fill leaves with the mixture. Roll each up and tie securely with string. In a large skillet or deep pan, mix 1 No. 2½ can tomatoes with an 8-ounce can tomato paste. Add 3 bouillon cubes, 1 bay leaf and ¼ cup minced onion. Add the cabbage rolls. Cover and simmer 1 hour. Turn rolls occasionally. Thicken sauce slightly with a little flour-and-water paste. Remove strings, serve sauce over rolls. Makes 6 servings.

cost... $2.23

New BRILLO soap pads shine aluminum fast—give you more free time!

Speed through pot and pan clean-ups, have more time to be together

For faster cleaning, instant shine... there's special soap with Jeweler's Polish in every pad!

No other cleaning product lifts off burned-on grease and scorchy stains faster. And only Brillo contains special soap with Jeweler's Polish . . . to bring back like-new shine at the same time! Results are guaranteed. You get a new utensil free if Brillo fails to clean! Nothing cleans and shines aluminum like New Brillo Soap Pads.

Brillo Soap Pads (red box)... soap-filled metal fiber pads Brillo Cleanser (green box)... pads plus cake of soap

Brillo Mfg. Co., Inc., Brooklyn, N.Y.

THRIFTIER!
5, 12 and 20 pad boxes!

Note to husbands
Brillo does your clean-up jobs faster!

CHILD LOST

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 48

"I just don't want to run off and leave tonight."

"There's a nice sum of money involved for you, Phyllis."

"I'm not worried about that commission. They'll surely take one or the other of the houses." She hesitated. "Fred, could you be able to take them through the Wilson house for me?"

"Sure I could, but I don't know how you've been handling them."

"She wants the house. It's up to him if he's willing to go that high."

"All right," he said. "I can take them over, if that's all it is."

She replaced the telephone. "That's that." As she had said, she wasn't worried about the commission. The Farnsworths had to move on the fifteenth, and they were anxious to buy. Fred always said she had a way of putting over a deal, her feminine touch, he said, but in this case Mrs. Farnsworth was already sold on the Wilson place. There was a lot of money involved for her, around a thousand dollars, maybe.

She was suddenly aware of Sam watching her; she said quickly, "All ready but my lipstick."

"What was the tremendous struggle going on inside you?"

"Tremendous struggle?" she said, leaning closer to the mirror. "I didn't notice any."

"You looked as if you were fighting temptation," he said. "What was it, seeing some prospects instead of coming out with us?"

"Believe me, it wasn't any temptation," she said. "I've practically sold the house." Of course something could happen; the Farnsworths might stay in a hotel for the winter, they might even rent an apartment. She was shaken for an instant. "I'd hate to lose the commission. Naturally."

"Naturally," he said, grinning. "It would make it an expensive evening."

"And that seems very funny to you."

"Where did you get that idea?" he said, and put his arms around her and rocked her gently in them. "Look, you'll get that commission, if I know you. It's in the bag. Now let's get going and spend some of it. I'm hungry."

Eddie was on the stairs, peering at them through the banisters. "What are you doing?" he said.

"Hugging your mother," Sam said. "And you're next on my list." Eddie fled, shrieking, but Sam caught him, and finished carrying him upside down under his arm. He called from the foot of the stairs, "We're not waiting much longer for you."

She smiled to herself, listening to Eddie's squeals of pleasure; hurriedly she smoothed her hair where Sam had mussed it, and followed them down and into the car. They drove to the Marine Restaurant and ate lobster, all three of them tucked behind large starched bibs with red lobsters on them, and afterward they walked beside the deserted beach and the smooth, sunset-stained ocean until they reached the amusement park, and there Eddie drove one of the little cars jerked dizzily around at the end of a long iron bar, and piloted her in a boat on the artificial pond, and rode the merry-go-round.

She couldn't help thinking as she leaned over the railing watching him with Sam that it was going to be harder to buy lobster dinners on Sam's salary alone. True, most of their friends managed on no more, but then they didn't go out to dinner very often either. The cost of a baby sitter was an item to be weighed and reckoned, and as for household help, that was a once-a-week luxury. She would miss Bertha. More than that, she would miss her job, and not just for the comforts and conveniences it provided. With Bertha there, she had been able to go to work with a clear mind, knowing that Eddie would be in competent, kind hands. If only she had had a little more time to spend with Eddie.

She hadn't been with him nearly enough this summer. Financially it had been a good season; nearly everyone in New York seemed to want to escape the heat in an apartment or a house at the beach, and there were some weeks when she had to be at the office at least a part of every day. Luckily Sam had been able to take several long weekends instead of his usual week in August, and he and Eddie had been on the beach a lot, and Sam had taken him on a fishing boat several times. "He sure likes to tag after his daddy," Bertha would tell her, and there were times she envied them their easy, comradely relationship, something she hadn't achieved with Eddie. Maybe that was because she didn't have the time to do many things with him; maybe she was too self-conscious, always trying to make it up to him for her absence.

Well, pretty soon she'd be home with him for a long time. Only he'd be starting school tomorrow—and once the baby came —— She drew a sharp breath. Nothing seemed to be timed right with Eddie: he'd even been born inconveniently, with Sam only a year out of the Army and two more years of law school still ahead of him. Up to then they hadn't been able to put aside any money, and so she had remained at Banner Realty almost up to the week that Eddie had arrived, and she had started back at the job not too many weeks later.

Fortunately they had found Bertha: without someone like Bertha she couldn't have left the baby, no matter how badly they needed the money. Bertha had taken over, baby and household, and Eddie loved her. With the new baby it would be too much for Bertha; besides, it wasn't really necessary for her to keep her job any more. The money was nice to have, but the house was practically furnished now, and Sam's income from his practice was enough to support them, and so she had agreed to stay home. She still must make that definite with Fred; he didn't believe her when she told him she would, but then of course you never knew how things would work out. Bertha would stay at least until the baby came.

The carrousel was grinding to a halt; she looked at her watch: 8:30. They should start for home; there was no sense in getting Eddie overtired for the morning. She glanced meaningfully at Sam; he nodded. "Time to call it a day, Eddie."

"Aaaah. Just once more?"

"You've had three rides. Aren't you dizzy enough yet?"

Eddie careened wildly, staggered against Sam, embracing his legs. "No!"

"Well, O.K., once more, but this will be it." Sam went off to buy two more tickets.

She said, "Tomorrow is going to be a big day for you, sweetie. You don't want to be yawning all morning."

"This is the first time you've come here in a year almost!"

"Not a year, Eddie. Besides, you come here a lot with daddy."

"Not with you."

She couldn't help feeling pleased; she said teasingly, "Don't tell me you have time to miss me when you come here."

He hesitated, considering, and then he said seriously, "I used to, in the beginning."

Funny that his words should cut so; she watched him run toward Sam, who was waving the tickets at him, she watched Sam lift him on a black horse and take the camel behind him. It had been a busy summer; they'd managed to pay off some of the mortgage, and they'd bought the wrought-iron furniture for the terrace they'd been wanting for years.

They drove home in the hazy September dusk. Eddie was still not ready for sleep; he opened his presents and then he packed and repacked his new briefcase with his new pencil box and the crayons, and then Sam had to sharpen all the new pencils and they had to be arranged just so, and then Eddie had to walk up and down from room to room, swinging his briefcase the way Sam did. It was after nine when the telephone rang.

Phyllis answered. "Mrs. Berry? This is Mrs. Farnsworth. I'm so glad you're home. We've been trying to reach you."

"I did tell you I'd be out."

"Yes, and Mr. Banner explained. But Mrs. Berry, couldn't we borrow you for just ten minutes?"

"If it's to see the Wilson house, Mr. Banner can show you through."

"It won't be the same," Mrs. Farnsworth said, her voice sinking to a conspiratorial whisper. "You could sell Mr. Farnsworth the house, I'm sure. And I do prefer it to the other one, and I would like him to see it just in the right light, if you know what I mean."

"I haven't even put my son to bed."

"We'll just keep you ten minutes, I promise."

"I know, but ——" She looked at her husband. "If it will just be for ten minutes ——"

She put down the telephone a little helplessly. "Would you mind if I went out for a very short time?"

"That same woman?"

She nodded. "I don't want to leave you both."

"If you have to, go ahead, Phyl. I'll get Eddie started for bed."

"Would you? I'll be back before you turn the lights out."

Eddie said nothing, buckling the flap of the briefcase, but she was very conscious of his silence as she found her keys and a sweater. At the door she turned, and found him beside her. "What is it, sweetie?"

"You coming back before I'm asleep?"

"I most certainly am going to try. By the time you're in your pajamas and washed you'll most likely see me looking in your door. And you can wait in bed for me if I'm not there."

"O.K.," he said quietly, "because I might want you to snuggle tonight."

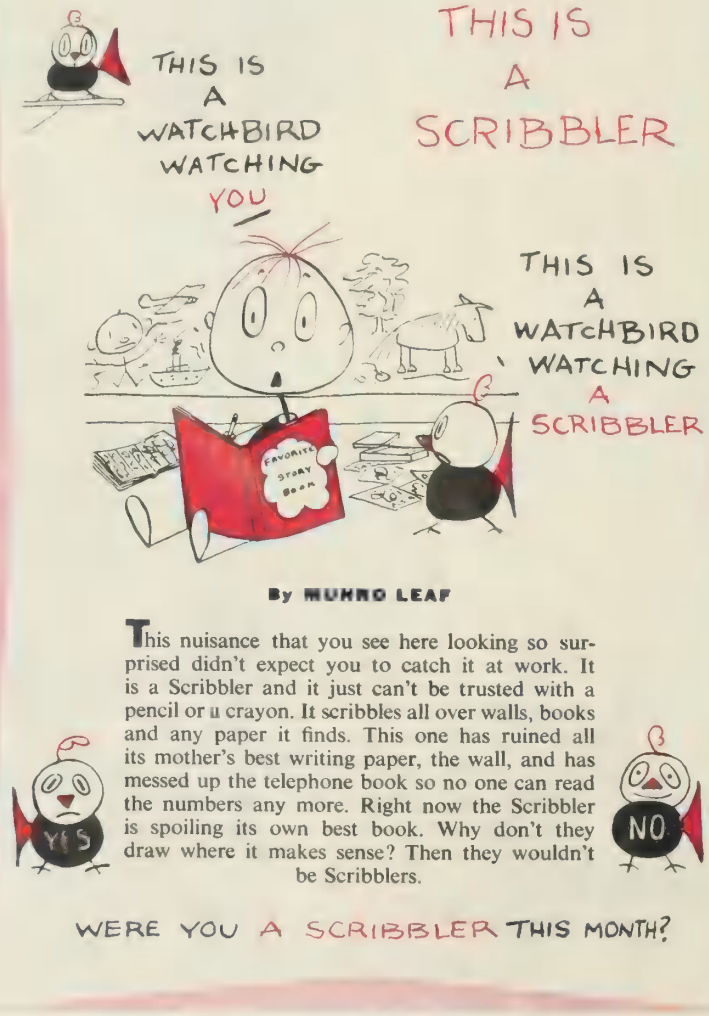
She ran down the steps to the car. She hadn't "snuggled" with him in over a year; it was part of a phase he had gone through, when he had wanted her to lie down on his bed until he fell asleep. She'd yielded to it because she recognized that, for whatever the reason, he needed her there; but he hadn't asked her to stay with him for many months now. Perhaps he was more concerned about school than they had imagined, or perhaps they were wrong to make as much of it as they had: it might have been more sensible to accept it without any special attention, matter-of-factly. In a way they had been selfish, trying to encircle this day in red in their own minds, to arrest this moment in time for themselves. It was momentous, starting school, a beginning . . . and an ending.

She halted impatiently at the red light at the base of the hill. Ten minutes. How could she be only ten minutes? It would take ten minutes just to reach the Banner office and pick them up, and you couldn't rush Mrs. Farnsworth. True, buying a house wasn't anything to be rushed, but why did it have to resolve itself to tonight? Her wheels squealed as she swerved to the curb in front of the office.

Mrs. Farnsworth greeted her eagerly. Mr. Farnsworth said a little heavily, "So you're responsible for tempting my wife with a house she can't afford!"

"Please don't buy it, if you can resist it," she said.

At night the old garden behind the Wilson house smelled rich and sweet, the house loomed large and white and imposing. Mrs. Farnsworth breathlessly pointed out the circular driveway. "Not any of these skimpy little concrete ribbons."



"It's kind of like Tara," said Mr. Farnsworth, trying not to seem impressed.

"Here's where I'd put a large iron carriage lamp," Phyllis said.

"Probably doesn't look half as good by daylight," rumbled Mr. Farnsworth.

She felt obliged to point out that it did need a painting, and that the kitchen would need all new appliances, but it didn't really matter, she could see, because once she had thrown the door open onto the ample center hall with a glimpse of a paneled study beyond, she knew they would buy it. Mr. Farnsworth still felt obliged to inspect the beams in the cellar and rap on the plaster and question her about the

CONTINUED ON PAGE 142

1958

Eat Light and Lively!

New recipe for happy summer meals

FRENCH'S Barber-Pole Franks

More fun than a circus for kids and grown-ups—and so easy for you—

8 frankfurters, large size
1½ cups biscuit mix
4 teaspoons French's Mustard for dough ⅓ cup milk
plus enough French's Mustard to fill frankfurters

Place franks in boiling water. Let stand 8 min. Measure biscuit mix into bowl. Blend mustard with milk, add to mix. Roll out into 8-inch square, ¼ inch thick. Cut in 8 one-inch strips. Split franks half through; fill with mustard. Wrap dough in spiral around each frank. Place on greased cookie sheet. Brush with butter. Bake in hot oven, 450° F., 10 to 12 minutes or until lightly browned. Serve hot.

Friendly Warning: Because French's Mustard has a special flavor, texture and color all its own, don't expect best results from this recipe with any other mustard.

New twist on good old hot dogs! Turn them into gay gold 'Barber-poles' with French's new recipe! French's own mustard recipe calls for rare spices, specially grown mustard seeds, and the finest vinegar. That's why more women choose and use French's Mustard than any other mustard.

On food... In food

no other mustard has the light and lively flavor of

FRENCH'S MUSTARD

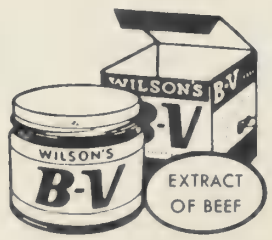
STRONG WILTPROOF

CHI-NET® PAPER PLATES

Put CHI-NET first on your picnic list. These strong, rigid paper plates add to the enjoyment of outdoor eating because they don't buckle or bend, even when loaded with food. And, they resist grease and moisture; don't get limp.

CHI-NET paper plates are available in a variety of shapes, sizes and colors. Look for them in their attractive transparent packages at your favorite food or variety store. The CHI-NET oval on the wrapper tells you that here is a new and different kind of paper plate.

KEYES FIBRE COMPANY
WATERVILLE, MAINE



Be Wise-Buy KEYES MOLDED PRODUCTS

B-V BURGERS with the T-BONE TOUCH!

Look at 'em—taste 'em, you'll want more. That's what happens when you brush B-V on or mix it in with hamburgers—they turn budget specials into gourmet delights! Try B-V—it brings the professional chef's "T-Bone Touch" right into your kitchen!

Also try B-V for:

STEW • GRAVY • SOUP • HOT CUP

Wilson & Co., Inc.
Meat Packers, Chicago

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 140

expense of a new heating unit, and so it was almost an hour before she drew them back into the car and over to the Banner office, where she left them with Fred.

"You've got yourself a deal, young lady," said Mr. Farnsworth. "I only hope I can catch up on some of the sleep you've cost me on the plane tomorrow morning."

Mrs. Farnsworth gave her hand an extra pressure. "We didn't even dream we'd keep you this long," she breathed, "but thanks! And wasn't it worth it?"

A thousand dollars. Yes, she had to admit that it was; there wouldn't be much more of it in a few months, and it certainly hadn't been hard to earn. And yet she had a lead weight in her chest when she pulled up into the garage: usually she couldn't wait to tell Sam, tonight she didn't want to talk about it.

Sam was reading when she came into the living room. "Take it easy, honey," he said. "You don't have to be rushing around this way."

"Eddie?"

"He was up when I left him," he said. "But drooping fast."

She hurried upstairs to Eddie's room. He was asleep. She sat down heavily on the edge of his bed, choked with disappointment. He was sucking his thumb as he still did once in a while just when he was about to fall asleep; even as she watched him his thumb fell from his lips, and he started, and found it again without waking. If only he would open his eyes, and see her there, and know that she had come, finally. But this was ridiculous: she was making much out of nothing. She would make a point of staying with him tomorrow night. Besides, he'd had a full and wonderful evening, and he must have gone to sleep happy.

She eased the thumb out of his mouth gently; his mouth remained parted, his face deeply submerged in sleep. She bent and kissed him; his dark straight hair was too long, but everyone had been too busy to take him for a haircut. She pulled his blanket a little higher, she picked up a small car from the floor, she put out his clean clothes for the morning, and then when she could find no more excuse to stay she went downstairs.

She sat down close to Sam and put her head back against his arm. "Was he disappointed because I didn't get back on time?" she asked carefully.

"Forget it, Phyl," he said. "I think he was too sleepy to think too much about it. How did you make out?"

"They're buying the Wilson house," she said. No elation at all.

"Bully for you," he said. "What are you going to do with all that money?"

"It will cover the cost of the baby, for one thing."

He said, "I think I can manage to cover the cost of the baby myself."

"I know you can," she said. "I was just being figurative. It's going to come in handy, isn't it?"

"Not that handy," he said. "Not that important. Not to either of us any more. There was a time when we really needed it, but not any more, and don't give that to yourself as a reason for working, because even you don't believe it."

"Did I ever say that was the reason?" she said with dignity. "I prefer working, as long as I have the choice. I've been good at my job, Fred's satisfied, I like working with people, I've wanted to work."

"That's the way I sized it up," he said. "That's why I've gone along with you. Maybe I'd have liked it if you could have been home the last couple of years, but I'm not one of these Kinder, Kuche, Kirche husbands, and if that job makes you a more satisfied woman I'll be satisfied with it."

"Why do you bring all this up now, Sam?"

"Because I've been thinking about you. As I sometimes do," he said, his arms tightening around her. "I was wondering if you'd done the best thing for yourself. For yourself, mind you, not for us."

"Wouldn't I have quit if I hadn't been happy about the job?" She turned, so as to see his face; she tried to laugh. "Ah, tonight isn't fair to judge by. I admit I'm upset about tonight, walking out on the two of you when I wanted to stay." Even speaking about it brought her alarmingly close to tears.

"It's Eddie's starting school that's upset you," he said slowly. "It sort of brings you up short, doesn't it? Makes you wonder about your values, makes you want to stop and take stock of what you have." He pushed her to her feet. "Let's get to sleep, Phyl. Tomorrow's a big day for the family."

Only she couldn't sleep. She read, she turned out the light, she puffed her pillow, and tried to find a comfortable position, but finally she gave up and put on her robe and went into ldie's room. He was still sleeping soundly, rely stirring. Am I the only one that's dis-bed by tomorrow? She went back into her d and carefully lay down. Sam said drowsily, re you still awake?" and flung his arm er her.

"I like it."

"What kind of wife am I, Sam?"

"You haven't heard me complain," he uttered.

"Am I any kind of mother at all?" she nispered.

"Eddie thinks you are. Phyl, we're fine, ldie and I. You're going to be home for good etty soon, and then there won't be any more ubts." His words, his voice, the weight of s arm all soothed her to sleep.

•

he morning was a rush, because Bertha dn't come till nine, and Sam's train left half hour before Eddie was due at school. And ere were unexpected labels to be ripped from ldie's new clothes, and points on the new ncils that kept breaking and had to be re-arpened, and spilled orange juice—her own ult, the pitcher had slipped from her hand—hich meant that Eddie's shirt had to be anged and juice mopped from the table and e chair and the floor, but she managed to get m to the station on time, and to get back to t on lipstick and brush Eddie's hair again d buckle the straps of his briefcase again, d finally they were in the car and heading for hool.

She drew the car up to the curb and sat ck, letting out her breath in an exclamation relief: they'd made it. She had registered ldie last week, and they had gone to the ndergarten room and met his teacher. This orning it would be all right for the mothers come and stay with their children as long as e children wanted them, the teacher had id, until they were ready to stay by them-lves. She opened her door. "I think the kids e going in, sweetie. Let's go too," she said Eddie.

He got out of the car slowly. "Mamma," he id, "you don't have to come in with me."

She was taken aback. "But I'd like to, if you ant me to."

"If I'm big enough to go to school, I guess m big enough to go in by myself," he said.

"Well, ye-es," she said. "Yes, I guess you e."

"I guess I'll be too old for snuggling, too, ter today."

"Why, no," she said in consternation, "I n't think there's any connection."

"I think so," he said. "I think I'll be too old ter today. Well, so long."

"Wait," she said. "Are you sure you'll be le to find the room?"

"Sure," he said. "It's the same one we went to that day." He was edging off when she called him.

"You're not too old to give me a kiss good-by, are you?"

"I forgot," he said, and came back and threw his arms around her briefly and brushed her cheek. "They're going in," he said in alarm, backing off.

"See you at lunch!"

He didn't turn around, his thin brown legs carrying him very fast, his briefcase bumping beside him. He looked very small as he joined the other children and disappeared through the open doors.

A beginning, and an ending. She went back into the car and just sat there for a while, shaken, assailed by the most unaccountable memories. Eddie as a very small baby lying on Bertha's lap, laughing at Bertha as she patted him dry after his bath. Bertha holding the bottle to his mouth, his small hand curled over Bertha's. The little fire-chief car they had bought for him, when he was still too small to reach the pedals in comfort, and he had called out to her, red-faced and angry with frustration, but she had been late for an appointment and couldn't help him. Eddie carrying his well-worn book to her, leaning against her as she combed her hair to go out. "When are you going to read it?" "When I come home tonight, sweetie. Ask Bertha now." A rainy, windy afternoon, so gray that Sam had made a fire in the fireplace to cheer up the room, and then had carried down Eddie, just getting over a virus and wrapped in a blanket, and had bundled him into the wing chair. "I'll be back early," she had told Eddie, bright-eyed and still a little flushed with fever, and she had paused and looked back at them in the firelit room, envying them.

She shut her eyes. She'd had such a brief taste of his first five years, just enough so she could now begin to estimate the extent of her loss. Only it wasn't a loss, actually: she had given those five years away, her eyes wide open, she had given them deliberately to Bertha. And now Bertha could tell her all about them, those special and unique and exhausting and distracting and unimaginably wonderful and never-to-be-replaced five years.

The school doors were shut, the schoolyard quiet Unconsciously she had been clasping her arms against herself. I'm lucky because I'm going to have another chance at reliving what I missed this time. But it wouldn't be quite the same ever again. Eddie was the first. And today Eddie was beginning school, moving out and away from childhood on the too soon path of growing up, and those first five years were lost forever. Eddie. Eddie. Child lost.

EDUCATING TODAY'S CHILD

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 26

ook, but he must spend hundreds of hours king histories, doing physical examinations, orking out diagnoses before he can apply his eoretical knowledge. He has to study human elings and human relations in theory and in ctual experience with patients. Otherwise he on't be able to understand half the symptoms at are presented to him, and he may not even e able to get along with some of the people ho come to him for help.

In regard to the accusation that education is ecoming too easy and that today children are etting away with murder, it's wise to take into ccount certain aspects of human nature. Here a paragraph from an editorial in a New ork paper: "When we were mere boys, boys ad to do a little work in school. They were ot coaxed; they were hammered. Spelling, riting and arithmetic were not electives; and ou had to learn. In these more fortunate mes, elementary education has become in any places a sort of vaudeville show. The hild must be kept amused and learns what he leases." It is from the New York Sun in ctober, 1902, years before most of the ideas alled modern or progressive had been intro-uced into teaching.

Here is another example: "The children ow love luxury, they have bad manners, ontempt for authority, they show disre-pect for elders, and love chatter in place of exercise. Children are now tyrants, not the servants of their households. They no longer rise when elders enter the room. They contradict their parents, chatter before company, gobble up dainties at the table, cross their legs, and tyrannize over their teachers." This complaint comes from Socrates in 400 B.C.

I don't give you these quotes to try to prove that our schools are all right, but only to show that there have always been complaints and that they have to be weighed discriminately. There are tragic deficiencies in many, many of our schools: insufficient classrooms, crowded classes, half-day sessions, insufficient teachers, inadequately trained teachers, salaries so low that we are not gaining ground in recruitment despite the fact that the numbers of pupils will continue to mount rapidly. Under such circumstances the best of educational policies will be inadequately applied.

The way to decide about your schools is, of course, to visit them, hear what they are trying to do, see how wisely they are carrying out these aims, hear what their handicaps and needs are. Then you'll have to campaign with them to persuade the community to give them the support that's justified. In a democracy there is no other way.

Dr. Spock regrets that it is impossible for him to answer letters personally. However, he is delighted to receive suggestions of topics of truly general interest.—Ed.

AS DELICIOUS AS ALL OUTDOORS

Marshmallow Fruit Grill

New dessert idea using fruits and marshmallows heated together on your charcoal grill!

It tastes simply marvelous and is the easiest way in the world to end your barbecue in a blaze of glory.

Line a shallow baking pan with aluminum foil with enough to fold across the top of the pan. Fill pan with assorted fruits.* Allow one cup of fruit per serving. Then arrange Campfire Marshmallows on top of fruit—use 4 regular marshmallows (or ½ cup of miniatures) to one cup of fruit. Fold aluminum foil over top of pan and heat on charcoal grill (or in a slow oven) until marshmallows start to melt—about 15 minutes. Serve plain or over ice cream.

*Suggested fruits: chunk pineapple, sliced bananas, apricot halves, grapes, cherries, plums, strawberries and melons in season.

Campfire®

MARSHMALLOWS

fresh-fluffed to stay soft and tender

The big ones! The tiny ones, too!

Made in one of America's cleanest confectionary kitchens

Look for this chuck-wagon display at your grocers

NEW IDEA!

CHUCK-WAGON COOK-OUT WITH STRONG ALCOA WRAP ALUMINUM FOIL

Round up the kids and go! Alcoa® Wrap makes outdoor cooking a picnic—seals in the tasty flavor of your foods, cooks 'em in much less time, eliminates messy pots and pans. Try these easy recipes . . .

Western Dogies

At home: Split frankfurters, place in rolls. Fill frank with zesty barbecue sauce. Wrap bun and frank in Heavy-Duty* square of Alcoa Wrap, using tight double folds.

At cook-out: Place packages on grill to side or back where heat is not too intense. Cook for 25-30 minutes, turn frequently. Serve in opened foil.

*or use double thickness of regular weight

Redskin Corn-on-the-cob

At home: Husk corn. Brush with melted butter; season with salt, paprika. Wrap each ear in dampened paper towel; place in square of Alcoa Wrap. Double-fold foil around cob, twisting ends tightly.

At cook-out: Grill over medium coals, 20-25 minutes, turning frequently. Serve in open package.

"ALCOA THEATRE" Exciting Adventure alternate Monday evenings

ALCOA WRAP IS STRONG BECAUSE IT'S SMOOTH!

Regular: 25 feet long, 12 inches wide

Economy: 75 feet long, 18 inches wide

12" Heavy-Duty: 25 feet long, 12 inches wide

Heavy-Duty: 25 feet long, 18 inches wide

100 MEN AND THE GIRLS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 57

on the verge of proposing to a girl when a rush of work happened to coincide with a dinner date at her home. "I was late and I got a chilly reception. My job meant nothing—her mother's dinner and the trouble they had gone to for me was all that counted. I began to realize she was not interested in me; I was a convenience, nothing more." There was no proposal.

Consensus (with apologies to Lord Byron): Love is of man's life a thing apart; his job's his whole existence.

"Girls brag about expensive dates."

A phrase I had almost forgotten cropped up often in these interviews: "A good-time Charlie." According to my informants, the unsuspecting male is too often cast in this role. "A girl will sit back with a look that says, 'Well, here I am, entertain me,'" said a young businessman, "and all she wants is the best, no matter what it costs you." Several men who work in large offices told of being unfavorably impressed by the morning chitchat about dates. "If the girls are telling the truth," said one, "they must all know millionaires. I don't know about the other bachelors in the office, but when a girl makes it plain that she's a luxury item my interest is lost before it's well roused."

A newspaperman told me that once, on a date, he had had to settle for a cup of coffee for dinner because the girl, aware that he was broke, had ordered the most expensive items on the menu. And a lanky young engineer new to industry and the weekly payroll confessed that he was spending a disproportionate amount of his salary on dates. "I'm crazy about this girl and I see her as often as possible. Maybe I'm going to marry her. But I wish sometime she would stop and think about what our dates cost me. How can a guy get married if he hasn't got a dime in the bank?"

The girl with a job shows little comprehension of the problem unless she is on her own and coping with a budget, say the men, but as a rule she is less demanding than the girl who has always known financial security. "If a girl's father has never had to worry about money, she takes it for granted that you wouldn't be dating her unless you were well heeled," said one of the few Ivy Leaguers I canvassed.

Whatever their financial status, only a fractional percentage favored going Dutch. The older men were strongly against it—"When the girl's money comes into it, the situation is entirely out of your hands"—but the young dissenters said, "If the kind of evening she wants isn't possible unless you split the tab, and she's willing to do it, why not?"

Consensus: "I'd love to go for a walk" is music to a poor man's ears. He does not hear it often.

"There's no return hospitality."

I asked whether the men were invited to dinner by the girl or her family after a few dates. The answers ranged from a somewhat heated "Never!" to a definitely cool "No, and I prefer it that way. I'd rather not be obligated." The majority seemed more than willing to accept whatever obligation might be incurred. "A man who keeps bachelor quarters gets tired of his own cooking," said one, "but you can't ask a girl why she doesn't invite you to dinner. All you can do is hope that she'll think of it."

It was generally agreed that the girl who has her own apartment, or shares one with another girl, is more likely to show thoughtfulness in this respect.

Remembering with what diffidence I, as a girl (and I was, once), had proffered tickets for

CARPET

● In the beginning carpet was not made exclusively as a floor covering. It was woven to wear, to cover a table or a couch, or to spread before a seat of honor. The art is of great antiquity, being known in Egypt at least 3000 years before Christ. As with other ancient skills, its products were mainly the perquisites of gods and human dignitaries, and the designs used conveyed much religious symbolism. Priceless squares were laid before temple altars and before the thrones of kings. Prayer rugs were small, significant mats on which to kneel on the cold floor of a mosque or temple. It is still a gesture of respect to "roll out the red carpet" in honor of a distinguished guest.

The actual work of ancient weaving was interesting, highly skilled and laborious. On a rude hand loom was strung a durable warp. About each weft thread were knotted small tufts of the long silky hairs of the goat or camel. The quality of the carpet was measured by the number of these knots to the square inch, which number varied from 400 to 1000. After each weft thread had been tied full of knots it was beaten into place and the next one started. So slow and meticulous was the work that a rug, with its pattern, might be handed down in a family and not be finished in a generation. The rug when finished was sheared to a velvet smoothness, and the vegetable dyes used gave a glowing mellowness to the rich varied colors.

The Navaho Indians in America wove rugs and blankets by much the same method, using coarser wools but much symbolical design. Saracen weavers, who came by way of Spain and Italy, were at work in France in the thirteenth century. In 1685 the revocation of the Edict of Nantes scattered skilled weavers all over Europe and soon in England, at Kidderminster, Axminster and Wilton, carpets began to be woven on hand looms. They continued to be so made until in 1839 Erastus Bigelow invented the power loom and carpets gradually became one of the comforts of the ordinary home.

Antique carpets with their mellow dyes and silky pile and almost indestructible quality have become almost priceless "museum pieces." But the softly glowing Persians, symbolical Chinese and primitive Caucasian designs are being copied fairly successfully in modern factories. The making of rag carpet and hooked rugs was a thrifty domestic occupation in pioneer America. A family surplus of sturdy cotton "rags" could be sewed into long strands by the housewife in odd moments and then turned, under the hand of the local weaver, into a cheerful and durable floor covering. Especially when underlaid by a layer of soft straw, it added much coziness to a frugally heated house. The making of hooked rugs, in which fine strips of woolen cloth were hooked in a design through a linen, canvas or burlap base, often developed into a primitive art of genuine originality and sometimes of real beauty. Commercial carpet weaving began in America in colonial times. The first important factory was in Philadelphia in 1798. In 1804 another was opened in Worcester, Massachusetts. Others grew up gradually, utilizing advancing chemical and mechanical science in their processes of dyeing, weaving and marketing.

MARY K. BLACKMAR

a football game or a play to my current romantic interest, I was glad to hear the men speak with approval of this return gesture. "When a girl forks out her own dough for your entertainment," a salesman said, "it counts twice: she's saving you trouble and money, and she's letting you know she likes you. What could be more welcome?" But there was general agreement that it happens infrequently. The suggestion was made by one or two of the younger men that the girl who is dating a man not yet established financially might make a lasting impression by accepting complete responsibility for every third or fourth date. "She could begin by inviting him home to dinner."

Consensus: The man with marriage in mind wants to meet the girl's family. He would welcome an invitation to meet them at dinner.

"Some of it's our fault."

The continuing trend away from the double standard of morals was given serious consideration, and in group interviews the men voiced their opinions readily and listened with interest to the comments of others. I was impressed by their honesty.

"Unfortunately we are all human," and "Sexual appetite is not limited to the male," and "Ideal behavior is not statistical behavior" summed up the general view. But only the cynics (and they were few) were happy with it. There were deeply felt protests.

"It does not matter that I have had someone in my life," said an emotional first-generation American, pounding his chest for emphasis. "I am a man, and man is an animal. But I would not, could not marry a girl who was not a virgin—a girl who had belonged to another man."

A physician said, "I believe doctors tend to be more forgiving in this respect; we see people as they are. But in our private lives we are conservative, and the man who wants a really fine wife looks for a girl with self-control and a high standard of behavior."

"When two people are in love," said a thoughtful young businessman, "it is very hard for them to observe the strictures of society." His theme was taken up by a lawyer I talked with in a later interview. "The possibility of an affair becomes more imminent if the engagement is protracted. Then if the couple fails to marry, whatever blame society imputes to their conduct must be shared." He would prefer to marry a virgin, he said, but if he fell in love with a girl who had had an affair he might find it possible to accept her past when he knew the circumstances. "It might have happened against her will, or she might have been too deeply infatuated to realize the significance to herself of such consent."

A difficult problem at best, it was one the men believed must be decided not by rule but by imponderables the heart alone can understand.

In sum, the ideal is still the girl who waited, the girl who does not need to argue her case.

"Do girls have minds?"

The college girl took the brunt of the criticism here. "In my experience," a newspaperman said, "the college-bred girl is a strange kind of bore with a great deal of specific information on certain subjects—but as a general conversationalist she is a flop." And a photographer on the same paper said, "They have painfully cliché attitudes toward art, politics and world events. They speak glibly, but if you start to probe they will ease away—and most of the time you find it more interesting to talk to the boys in the bar." I heard variations of this from graduate students, businessmen and doctors, most of whom will probably marry a "college-bred" girl.

"They don't know anything about current events," a businessman said. "After they get out of high school and college they drop all that." As an afterthought he said that he never dated a girl twice if he found she could not hold her own in the talk.

A man whose sister is a schoolteacher told of trying to engage her in a conversation about "this Russian business." "I was appalled by her lack of information." Others said, "The girls have their own little circles and are oblivious of what goes on outside," and, "If you double-date and the girls start talking about clothes, you might as well not be there; it's all they care about."

Some blamed our educational system. But one pointed out, "They don't have to go to college to know how to read a book or a newspaper." Several expressed the opinion that the girl in a job takes a more active interest in world events than the girl who remains the daughter of the house, waiting for marriage.

Consensus: Intellectual companionship is the sex-plus that makes a girl irresistible.

"On the other hand ——"

They had words of praise. "The American girl is on top in every way, shape and form," said the chief storekeeper aboard the passenger liner, and he said it with warmth. A physician who had traveled extensively during his Army service said, "When I was abroad I could always pick out the American girl in any crowd. It isn't simply her chic, her style—it's a quality of personality. Our women are more vibrant looking, more dynamic." And a G.I. interviewed at Hickam Field said, "I'll take the home-grown girl every time. She's got everything."

Even the newspaperman most critical of the feminine lack of interest in things intellectual was able to be generous. "The American girl is, by and large, the most charming and intelligent and can hold her own in every way," he told me. He confidently expects to marry one, he added.

There was one interesting aside. "When you call for your girl," a young man said dreamily, "and she comes into the room wearing a lovely dress and looking as fresh as creation, it gives you a lift impossible to describe. It's as though she had brought herself into being just for you." He shook his head in smiling reminiscence. "It's wonderful."

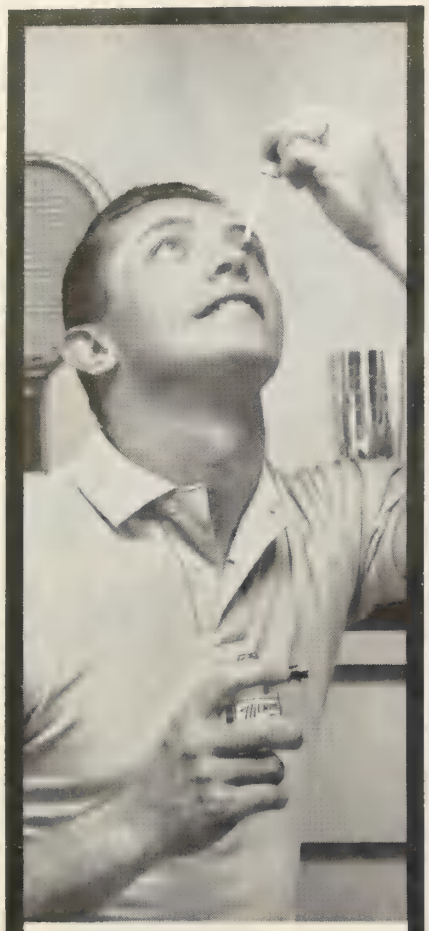
Consensus?

Bachelors are human. So are the girls they admire, criticize and, if they are lucky, marry.

END

The secret of dishes men like lies in their favorite seasoning

A man may not understand cooking, but he knows what he likes. And he likes food that's been seasoned with Lea & Perrins Worcestershire — so popular with men it is used in many homes, both in and on foods, as habitually as salt and pepper. You try it. But don't buy a substitute — it won't give the same lively, unique flavor. You'll notice at fine restaurants and clubs the world around, the Worcestershire is Lea & Perrins.



LEA & PERRINS
the original worcestershire sauce

*Exclusive new top gives a flow...or a drop.

FREE
64 PAGE
COOK BOOK
"Dishes Men Like"

Write: Lea & Perrins, Inc. • 241 West Street, New York City 13 • Dept. L

"How I use Murine to rest my eyes from the sun"

TONY TRABERT

Professional tennis star and former U.S. and Wimbledon singles champion

"The sun can really bounce and shimmer off a tennis court. So often between sets and always after a game I wink a couple of drops of Murine into my eyes. It rests and soothes them." Like Tony Trabert you'll find Murine is the quick way to rest, soothe and gently cleanse your eyes when they're bothered by glare, overwork, smoke or dust. Good idea every morning and night, too.

MURINE

FOR YOUR EYES*

New! Unbreakable dropper

THE MURINE CO., INC., CHICAGO, U. S. A.
*TRADEMARKS REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

VLADIMIR

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 51

candlelight and the illicit sherry parties; Cézanne prints on everybody's walls, and the bullfight posters; that febrile intellectual excitement shaking us all. Somebody had brought in Freud's Interpretation of Dreams; and the names, Spengler. Picasso. Hindemith, flashing like swords in the smoky little rooms, late at night. Shallow, false, absurd, Mrs. Brogden thought, adolescents playing at Bohemia. Good old Rosalie reading all that stodge out of Das Kapital; whatever became of Rosalie Smith? Mrs. Brogden suddenly laughed out loud.

"What's so funny, mother?"

"Thinking about what it was like at Miss O.'s."

"Oh, that." Ann had been accepted for Vassar in the fall; it was impossible to talk to her, she knew everything.

"Well, she was a . . . character," Mrs. Brogden said, choosing one of Ann's words. "Sanskrit and all that."

"Oh, I know," Ann said.

You don't know at all, Alice Brogden thought: that spare ramrod figure and the blue eyes, remote, dreamy; on occasion so direct, so piercing they stopped you dead in your tracks. Like the time —— Oh, there it was again—and she surrendered finally, helplessly, to the thought of Vladimir, whose last name she couldn't even remember, a funny one ending in "ski" or something. Now there was a nice piece of Freudian forgetting for you; but the bold square face came swimming back, and the burning hazel eyes, never really forgotten: Vladimir, who had played for Miss O.'s girls in the chintzy drawing room at Birch Hall and stayed to tea afterward. He was a Russian—a Pole?—all of thirty-five years old, a concert pianist (soloist with the orchestra the week preceding) and Miss O.'s greatest triumph of the season, snared for the school at a nominal fee. The old girl should have known better, Alice Brogden thought; Vladimir, for goodness' sake, offered up to a bunch of swooning seventeen-year-olds.

She looked at Ann, pulling the crumpled pack of cigarettes out of her coat pocket belligerently, lighting a cigarette man-fashion, cupping the match expertly in her two hands. Ann wouldn't have swooned, not Ann, who had finished with crooners and movie stars at thirteen, who knew all about atomic-power plants and cutting up frogs in biology class; knew exactly what she was doing and where she was going.

But I was just at that silly pseudosophisticated stage, Alice thought, a senior and blasé about Chopin. The first thing I ever said to the man was something rude about Chopin—and she remembered the dress, and the mess of little chiming bracelets she affected that year. There had even been a twelve-inch jade-green cigarette holder involved. Goodness, Mrs. Brogden thought, cringing; why on earth did he pay the least attention to me?

Mon cher maître, Miss O. had called him that afternoon. Oh, she had fluttered a bit that afternoon, even though afterward she fell back on the expected words: foreigner, adventurer, in a scathing voice. But even she was a little bit smitten by his sensuous, lingering style at the piano. How it had melted them, and his manner, and his eyes. Even the scholarly Miss O., who read Sanskrit, and the sophisticated Alice, who managed Baudelaire in the original French, how they drowned that afternoon in the music of Chopin.

And when he had finished, when the ecstatic hand clapping faded away and he stood up from the piano, black-coated, heavy-shouldered, how enormously masculine he seemed, menacing even, in the pale chintzy drawing room among the applauding swimmy-eyed girls. He had wiped his hands and his mouth on a white silk handkerchief, stepping forward to receive the adulation, the introductions.

Alice was one of the last to be presented to him.

"And this is Alice, cher maître," Miss O. had said and he had tried to swallow her up at once with one look. His hand was very large, very white; he smelled agreeably of bay rum and Egyptian tobacco, and Alice, staring boldly into his extraordinary hazel eyes, had said:

"I don't care too much for Chopin myself; he's a bit too effeminate for my taste."

Silly little thing, Mrs. Brogden thought now; throwing myself at the man's head and not knowing the least what I was doing. Or did I? He never left my side all afternoon; lapsing into French, letting fall those magic place names. "When I played in Zagreb," Vladimir said, "in Budapest, in Rome, in Vienna." Showing me his ring, the amethyst cut as a scarab, "a present from the Queen of Egypt on the occasion of ——" Vladimir said.

How I lied, Mrs. Brogden sighed. It seemed so absolutely necessary at the time, it came off my tongue as easy as —— I told him I was nineteen. From the West. I let him believe father's farm was a ranch, thousands of acres; he seemed to want so much to believe that. It was his first time in America, he had all those funny ideas ——

Absurd, really absurd, Mrs. Brogden thought and then, dismally reduced to some sort of honesty: He was charming, and when he left, when he pressed my hand and said good-by and went away into that pale April dusk, I was so shattered with flattery, so dizzy with desire, so lightheaded with love—I flew upstairs and threw up.

In the morning, early, his flowers came by special messenger, the two dozen pink carna-

By education I mean that training in excellence from youth upward which makes a man passionately desire to be a perfect citizen, and teaches him to rule, and to obey, with justice. This is the only education which deserves the name. That other sort of training which aims at acquiring wealth or bodily strength is not worthy to be called education at all.
PLATO

tions in the long white box and the shiny green paper and all the girls crowding into my room to see, hiding their envy under those shrill little shrieks and screams of female laughter. There had also been the note, the invitation.

"Bliss . . . in that dawn to be alive," Mrs. Brogden quoted to herself, "but to be young was very heaven!" . . . That's a lot of rot, she told herself sternly, grasping at Ann's language like a drowning man. No, no, I don't mean that, only that it's so terrible being that young. I've never known anything that hurt so much. Remember that, you old fool, she said to herself, looking at Ann.

Because without permission, unchaperoned, Alice had gone to meet Vladimir at his Boston hotel. She remembered her heart beating like hummingbird wings, too fast to count, as she stepped into the lobby, her head very high, and Vladimir (what an impossible name) had taken her hand in greeting and said with surprise, "But you're trembling. Come now, please sit down, I won't eat you." And they had sat down, with the utmost propriety, under the potted palms in the hotel lounge, and in that genteel aura of old ladies and airs from Cavalleria Rusticana had drunk tea and eaten toast, stealing sly sideways glances at each other, looking away when their glances tangled.

"Today you are a sphinx," Vladimir finally said very sadly. "And I also, I have lost my tongue." Then in that one strange burst of communication, he said, "Here I am now in America. I talk sometimes very big. Oh, I make a success, yes, but I am always pretending to be very big and, really, you understand, I am only peasant, my mother is old peasant woman back in Poland. Look. Look here at the wrist," and turning back the cuff, he had shown her his strong thick wrist, flexed the big square fingers. "The music is all here, here in the wrist, in the hand made like my mother's hand to dig potatoes. Now I make music with these peasant hands here in America."

Under his burning stare, Alice had actually leaned forward and touched his wrist, circling it part way with thumb and middle finger like a bracelet.

At that, Vladimir said in a choking voice, "Come to New York with me tonight, Alice, come to South America with me next week; I go on the tour to South America, to Buenos Aires, to Montevideo." And Alice, catching her breath, had managed to say, very coolly, "Yes, all right, if you like," just like that, as if it had been an invitation to go for a walk on the Common.

"My valises are packed already, I am going on the train at five o'clock. Here, look," he said, pulling out from his coat pocket the railway ticket, the steamship ticket, as if they were an offering of flowers, of jewels.

Absurd, absurd. "Ridiculous," Mrs. Brogden muttered out loud and glanced up quickly to see if Ann had heard, but Ann, leaning her head now against the cool glass of the window, staring outward to the empty platform in the gray-green March light, Ann was lost in some private dream of her own. Mrs. Brogden felt her knees trembling; she shook her head angrily.

They had actually got as far as New York that night, she and Vladimir, though with every mile on the New York, New Haven and Hartford Alice had begun to feel less sophisticated and more frightened. Stepping off the train at Penn Station, they had walked straight into Miss Oglesby, Miss Oglesby at least ten feet tall, her eyes squinted very small and as hard, as blue-black, as bits of obsidian. With her usual omniscience, she had wormed some of the truth out of Rosalie Smith, the rest from the hotel management, and had flown down from Boston in time to meet them at the station. Alice had never been so glad to see anyone in her life.

"Mon cher maître," Miss Oglesby said to Vladimir, adult speaking to adult over the head of the very young, "I am so sorry that this child has been annoying you, but she is only seventeen years old and unless I get her back to Boston at once, we shall have serious trouble with the police."

Poor Vladimir, he was as frightened as I was, Mrs. Brogden thought, poor dear Vladimir, such a poor skeleton rattling in the attic cupboard all these years, and yet—after all—oh, dear, if only—but how can you ever know?

From up the valley she heard the deep lonely cry of the diesel, signaling for the Paw-Paw crossing, and Ann, rousing, was turning to look at her.

"Mother," Ann said, "don't look so flustered, the old woman won't eat you." She whipped out her lipstick and the little hand mirror.

"No, of course not," Mrs. Brogden said. "Here, let me look at myself." She put a hand up to her hair, her hat.

Now the bell at their own Bordeaux crossing began to toll mournfully, the black-and-white-striped gates slanted down across the road, the engine came snuffling round the bend with its orange snout to the tracks.

There was only one passenger off the 4:23 that afternoon, a thin old lady in gray, with a topcoat over her arm. She held herself very erect, though; she came toward them, somehow as knowing, as serene as God Himself, and she took Mrs. Brogden's outstretched hand with a long unsmiling look of inspection. Then, unbending just a little, she said, "Well, Alice, how are you?" as if she no longer needed to ask.

"And this is Ann," Mrs. Brogden finally remembered, turning to look at Ann herself: the wispy Italian haircut, the pert, pale face, the too bright lipstick too thick on the sulky young mouth that was curving now into a polite smile of terribly false cordiality.

"Of course," Miss Oglesby said, softening now, smiling. "But I'd have known this child anywhere. . . . How d'you do, Ann. You're the image of your mother at seventeen, my dear, the very image."

END

Let's have a Chick-n-Que

...barbecued broilers and zesty Ocean Spray Cranberry Sauce!

Best thing that can happen to a cook-out! Fix summer's perennial favorite, chicken, this new way. Then pair it with its old friend—cool, smooth and sassy Ocean Spray Cranberry Sauce! Ocean Spray brightens any meal, indoors or out. And it makes any meal better for you, because it gives you 14 vitamins and minerals—and more natural pectins than any other fruit! Enjoy it any time. With any meat. Keep several cans of sassy, good-for-you Ocean Spray Cranberry Sauce in your refrigerator all the time.

MENU

Barbecued Chicken
Ocean Spray Cranberry Sauce
Chef's Salad
Potatoes Baked in Reynolds Wrap
Coca-Cola

TO PREPARE SAUCE: Measure ½ cup Mazola Oil, ¾ cup lemon juice or vinegar, ¼ cup water, 1½ tablespoons salt, 3 tablespoons sugar and 1½ teaspoons Tabasco into saucepan. Heat to boiling. Keep hot for basting chicken. Mix thoroughly before each basting. If you prefer a highly seasoned sauce, increase Tabasco and add mustard and Worcestershire sauce.

TO BARBECUE CHICKEN: Select two or three broiler-fryer chickens split lengthwise, quartered, or breast and leg parts. If using halves or quarters, hook wing tip behind shoulder joint onto back. Brush with the barbecue sauce. Place on grate set 12 inches or more from heat—skin side away from heat. COOK SLOWLY until tender, turning frequently and basting each time. Allow 1 to 1¼ hours for total cooking time. Drumstick should twist easily out of thigh joints. If parts are used, thickest pieces should be fork-tender. Just before serving, brush chicken with any leftover sauce or use for dunking.

Excellent results depend on slow cooking...glowing coals (not flame) and proper distance from heat.

JELLIED OR WHOLE BERRY

Serve Ocean Spray® every day— it's the natural mate for every meat!

Make salad dressings to your own taste better, easier, with golden light Mazola Corn Oil

The touch of genius to any salad is your own homemade dressing—what a wonderful variety of dressings you can make with golden light Mazola Corn Oil! Naturally lighter, sparklingly fresh, more delicate in flavor, Mazola blends better with all your zesty flavorings.

And—made-with-Mazola dressings stay pourable when chilled. Your crisp, cold salads will stay crisp and cold. Try the recipes shown here and discover how wonderful a salad can taste!

CORN OIL HAS A PLACE IN WELL-BALANCED MEALS

Everybody needs fats in their daily diet—and the kind you eat is important. Many well-known nutritional authorities recommend that from one-third to one-half of all the fats we eat should be the "unsaturated" kind such as corn oil. And Mazola is natural corn oil, made from good golden corn. You don't have to change your family's eating habits, just use Mazola Corn Oil in your everyday cooking—for frying, salads and baking.

Mazola® CORN OIL

...unsaturated...not hydrogenated

nutritionally unexcelled

CORN PRODUCTS REFINING CO.

FAVORITE SALAD DRESSINGS

BASIC FRENCH DRESSING — Measure into bottle or jar 1 cup MAZOLA Corn Oil, ⅓ cup vinegar, 3 tablespoons sugar, 1½ teaspoons salt, ½ teaspoon paprika, ½ teaspoon dry mustard. Cover tightly; shake well. Chill. Shake before serving. Makes 1⅓ cups.

Variations: Zesty Dressing: Add 1 teaspoon minced onion, 3 tablespoons tomato catsup, 1 teaspoon Worcestershire to Basic French.

Roquefort Dressing: Add 4 tablespoons crumbled Roquefort or Blue Cheese to Basic French.

CELERY SEED DRESSING — Place in bowl 1 teaspoon each salt, dry mustard, paprika and celery seed. Add ½ cup KARO® Syrup, Red Label, ¼ cup vinegar, 1 cup MAZOLA Corn Oil and 1 tablespoon grated onion. Beat with rotary beater until blended and thickened. Chill. Shake before serving. Makes 1¾ cups. Poppy may replace celery seed, if desired.

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 68

get a sitter for the kids and blow ourselves to a restaurant meal and candlelight?'

"John used to turn his back on any responsibility, duck out on the most necessary chores, to fool away an evening on pleasure. When I protested, he would sulk, drive over to see his parents, or—this happened often—he would get sick. When we were first married John could play three straight sets of tennis without being winded; very soon he developed asthma, sinusitis, a dozen allergies and ailments. Any time a little extra work piled up he was almost certain to collapse. But his health improved magically if a dance, a party, a picnic with the children were in the offing.

"Once when I was saving every penny to buy plastic tops for kitchen counters—this was when we were living in a four-room cottage I was desperately trying to improve so we could sell it at a profit—John invested a week's earnings in theater tickets and an evening dress for me. He was terribly hurt when I returned the tickets and the dress and applied the money to the kitchen renovation. In fact, he wouldn't install the plastic, and I had to call on father again for assistance.

"John is an ideal good-times companion, but he is never to be counted on if a companion or helper in the house is needed. That means work. He enjoys eating a fine dinner with the children and me, but he doesn't enjoy pitching in afterward on the cleanup job. What he wants to do is stack the dishes, pack us all into the car and barge off to a drive-in movie. Or visit his family.

"In some ways I like my in-laws better than I like my own parents, but I saw too much of them. Every Saturday all of us used to go to their small cramped house—John's father isn't a money-maker—and every Sunday they came to us. 'God must have created the weekends for my in-laws,' I once said to my sister. 'I spend five days working like a slave to keep John at work, and then we waste the weekends on his parents.'

"My temperament and John's are so radically different it may seem odd we married. To be honest, I guess I did more than my share of the chasing. At the age of eighteen I fell head over heels in love with John. One of the reasons—there were others—was that my mother disapproved of him.

"Mother and I have never agreed on anything. My dad has his faults, but, as a parent, he is a vast improvement on mother. Except for father, I would have had no affection when I was growing up. I think mother was disappointed that my sister Ann and I weren't boys. In public she pretended to love us, but in private she was cold and indifferent.

"I doubt mother ever cared for anybody in her whole life, and that includes my father. She bullied and bossed him and bossed and bullied Ann and me. She bought expensive clothes for us but wouldn't hear of our having regular allowances; she hung on to the family purse strings and forced us all to kowtow to her. At a time father was putting in fourteen-hour days on a big construction job, I can recall mother's ordering him to devote a Saturday afternoon to washing windows. She robbed him of every shred of dignity. Nothing he could provide pleased her for very long. All through my girlhood we moved at least once a year, always to a more impressive house. Ann and I hardly became acquainted in a neighborhood before we had to move. We lost friends so fast it hardly seemed worth the effort to make them.

"Before I was in my teens I was aware mother expected me to marry a rich husband who could shed glory on her. She was indifferent to my hunger for a peaceful, stable, loving home. She pushed me at every young professional man with whom she could scrape acquaintance and embarrassed me hideously by her tactics.

"John was the first man with whom I ever felt serene and comfortable. I met him at a political rally. Both of us were ushers. All the girls were mad for John; he was handsome, he was gentle and quiet-spoken, willing to listen as well as talk. I was pleased and flattered when he asked to take me home, although he told me that he had no regular job and was waiting to be called up by the Army. Very soon we were going steady. In those days I thought John had tremendous strength of character.

"One night he and I were very late getting in from a dance. Mother's light was still burning. The other young men I knew who knew mother would have left me at the door and run for safety. Not John. He took me inside, weathered mother's tirade and stood up for me. Right then I decided I loved him. A few weeks later he was drafted and sent to an Army camp thousands of miles away. I was terrified I would lose him. But then he wrote a letter that was almost, but not quite, a proposal.

"Without anybody's knowledge I took a job outside school hours, worked until I earned the fare and then caught a plane to John's camp. We were married right away. John and I had ten deliriously happy months before he received his sailing orders, the happiest months of my life. The two years John was overseas I lived with his parents—my in-laws and I got along fine then—and I held a job. I banked most of my earnings and my allotment from him. I used the savings to buy a house. When John left the Army he walked into his own paid-for home.

"His first job was selling machinery. It seemed to offer few chances for advancement—the hours were awfully short—and I encouraged him to take on a second job as well. He complained his hours were too long and soon he quit both jobs. He found a third job but was dissatisfied there, too, and so he tried a fourth job.

"For a short while John seemed proud of our home and glad to help me fix it up. But when we sold out and moved to a better house, for months he wouldn't lift a finger to repair a leak in the roof. He wouldn't even help me with the redecorating. As my interest in having a nice home increased, his interest decreased. Progress didn't seem to mean a thing to him. I blamed his parents, his mother especially, for spoiling him.

"When I became pregnant I hoped children would inculcate a feeling of responsibility in John. Personally I felt plenty responsible. I worked straight through my pregnancies and was back on a job or occupied with some money-making activity by the time my babies were a few months old. If I couldn't handle a nine-to-five deal, I sold secondhand cars, peddled beauty creams, sold real estate on commission, that sort of thing. John loved our children even as tiny babies, but in his own peculiar Johnlike fashion. I can remember that the nurses at the hospital teased me about the adoring way he stood at the nursery windows, hour after hour, watching Betty as a newborn infant.

"However, he didn't appear to realize it was up to him as the father to provide his children with advantages. Seemingly he was willing for me to keep on working forever. Before Betty was out of diapers I was worrying whether the poor child would have a pleasant home and pretty clothes when she was high-school age, or would grow up with nothing.

"John continued to drift from one job to another and I could never pin him down to talking about his long-range objectives. If I started a business conversation he would walk away. He quit the best job he ever had—he was assistant to a section sales manager—before I even knew he was thinking about a change.

"Quite early in our marriage I began to wish he would be a lot more practical and a little less loving. It seemed to me he was too loving. If I sat down to write a letter, he was likely to sit down near me. If I picked up a book he would turn on the radio and suggest we both listen to a program. If I left a room he followed me. Once I went to my sister's house for the evening and John telephoned three times just because he felt lonesome. Another time I was smack in the middle of painting the back porch and he was all cut up because I wouldn't interrupt the paint job and go inside and make love.

"Personally I'm so fed up and disgusted that divorce seems like the most logical solution to me. But the children miss John terribly. Betty has nightmares about her daddy and every evening the twins post themselves at the door in hopes he might visit. For their sake, I decided to gamble that professional counseling might persuade John that he should straighten up, accept his responsibilities and behave like a man. He has long since stopped listening to me."

John Tells His Side:

"The night Sari and I separated I was at the lowest period of my life," said broad-shouldered thirty-seven-year-old John. "I'd been sick for weeks with a sinus headache I couldn't shake. The tensions in our home were getting to our kids; they were screaming at one another the way Sari screamed at me. I'd just lost my business—a business I'd been pushed into by Sari, but it was a livelihood—and she had deliberately ignored my wishes and moved us into a two-family house in need of major repairs. These repairs I was supposed to carry out under the direction of Sari's father, with her on hand to command and instruct us both.

"Sari seems to get a special bang out of running me down before my father and mother. This is particularly disturbing to me, since I often wonder whether my piddling achievements haven't disappointed my mother as well as my wife. Mother and dad are wonderful people—I don't recall them ever criticizing my brother or me—but I have a sneaking hunch mother probably expected me to do better in the world than dad has done. Not that she has ever spoken a single, solitary word about it. Proud as mother is of Ted—he won a full scholarship at Johns Hopkins—she boasts as much about me to her friends as she boasts about him.

"I'm so proud of Ted myself that I bore people on the subject. My family is different from Sari's family. The four of us are congenial, companionable. I have an indescribably deep feeling of kinship with my brother, my father, my mother. My first memory, a very early memory, is of myself lying warm and safe in a blanketed crib with mother's face bending down from above as she leaned to kiss me.

"Mother encouraged me, just as later she encouraged Ted, to make my mark in the world. She worked from dawn until dusk to keep a spotless house and stretch dad's dollars to the limit—throughout my childhood she cooked for a dozen boarders—but she always found the time to go over my lessons with me, praise my good grades, try to help me boost the low grades. I just wasn't very scholarly.

"What I hoped was that someday I could make a big career in selling. I can still recall how I used to lie in bed at night, wide awake and worried, wondering about the future and whether my accomplishments as an adult would fall short of mother's great expectations. Years later, after I married Sari and was in the Army overseas, I lay awake in the same anxious way, wondering if I could measure up to the task of supporting a wife and children.

"My first job after my Army discharge was as a salesman. I like people and I enjoyed selling. I did well for a novice, but that shop operated on a six-hour day. Sari simply couldn't stand for me to have that much idle time. The first crack out of the box I was holding a second job, too, and was so overworked I eventually flopped at both. In addition, of course, Sari always kept dozens of chores lined up and waiting for me at home.

"Still love me?"

"Year after year she pressured me to work harder, make more money, buy a flossier automobile, finer furniture, a bigger house. We never bought a house that was satisfactory as it stood. Sari always wanted papering, painting, plastering, the works; then when the job was finished she wanted to sell and move on. If we got a new washing machine we immediately needed a new freezer; a new dishwasher called for new cabinets that required new counter tops. Actually I didn't fare too badly financially—most years I averaged five thousand to six thousand dollars—but no amount I earned ever fetched me any kudos. Sari could always point to more successful men. 'Onward and Upward' was her motto. In her scheme of things there was no time to admire and appreciate the possessions we had. No time for enjoyment or rest. No time to entertain friends, unless those friends offered the possibility of financial gain.

"When we moved into our two-family house, Sari was objecting furiously whenever we saw my parents, although she had been happy, during the war, to be their long-time guest. On the other hand, Sari's father, for whom she has very little real affection and for whom I have no respect, became a part of our daily existence. Why? Sari found him useful. It almost seemed he had supplanted me as the head of my own family.

"One evening I came home to discover that a crew of his workmen had built a high brick wall around our back yard, thus cutting us off from our neighbors. I made friends with neighbors. Sari seldom considered any neighbor of ours rich enough or clever enough for friendship.

"Another evening—this occurred the day before my brother's wedding and I was dead tired from running family errands—I found my father-in-law had unloaded a truckful of young trees in our back yard. There were twelve of them, carefully laid out on the grass in the spots where he and Sari figured they should be planted. My spade was also laid out. In the kitchen, my father-in-law was drinking a cup of coffee and waiting to superintend my gardening operations.

"Well, I walked into the house and on through the kitchen without a word. I went into the bathroom, climbed into a hot tub, and I soaked there until bedtime. I never did tell Sari what was eating me. But those twelve trees, which I didn't plant and didn't discuss, had quite a bit to do with my decision to move out on her and the kids. For days after I left I sat in a room by myself feeling numb.

"But I missed my children and on my weekly visits I could see they were suffering from the separation. Bob, our sensitive twin, went to pot at school; previously he had read and spelled like a Quiz Kid. Jim, the other twin, turned surly and impudent. And my daughter—well—Betty plain broke my heart. Last Saturday night Betty cried when I said good-by. She ran after me and caught hold of my coat. I had to pull her fingers loose before I could get free. Fifteen minutes later I was still so shaken up that I jumped a red light and wrecked the car I was driving. It wasn't even my car; it belonged to my brother. Ted had lent it to me so I could leave our car for Sari.

"The accident last Saturday was convincing evidence to me that divorce is not the answer for Sari and me and our children. I'll do anything within reason to glue our marriage back together.

"Sari complains that I don't talk enough, although her method of inviting me to join a conversation is to start a flood of criticisms the minute I walk in. Frequently her nagging gets me so riled I don't speak to her or anybody else for hours. One time I went four days saying only 'yes' and 'no.' Even on the occasions Sari isn't critical she talks such a blue streak that I sort of automatically shut my mouth and my ears and reach out for a newspaper, as my father does when mother rattles away at him while she continues bustling around the kitchen with her mind on a thousand other things. If Sari will agree to listen once in a while, I'll gladly postpone my newspaper reading and do some talking.

"If Sari could bring herself to push and prod less, I think my business record would improve. Her pushing isn't helpful to me. She takes away any feeling of pride I have in myself. Several years ago I landed as assistant sales manager under a boss I admired and who admired me. One night I drove him to our house to dinner, foolishly neglecting to notify Sari. Mistaking my boss for an ordinary friend and determined to clear the house of his presence, Sari handed me a pair of clippers along with instructions to clip our back-yard hedges. To avoid a scene I meekly followed orders. The boss followed me. Almost immediately there was a phone call from the office for him. Sari came rushing out, covered with blushes, confusion, apologies, a completely different character.

"All through dinner—a too elaborate dinner ordered in from a restaurant—she shone and twinkled like a Christmas tree. In her efforts to sell me as a genius she oversold herself as the wife of a genius. To the best of my recollection she described every job she ever held. Whatever Sari may have told you about her own career, I can tell you that her many and varied jobs have seldom amounted to much more than stocking money, if that. My boss was embarrassed by the exhibition, and I was so humiliated that I quit the job the next week.

"Sari hotly denies it, but the fact is she is now the spittin' image of her own pretentious, quarrelsome mother. I used to feel that she was on my side and standing back of me. If only she could change, get rid of her bossiness, restlessness and materialism, I believe we could be happy."

The Marriage Counselors Say:

"Sari has a quick intelligence, but she was much less responsive and intuitive than John," said one of the counselors. "She fancied she could read John like a book. In fact, his hopes and dreams, his fears and anxieties were unknown to her. She had no idea that John might feel doubtful and insecure, that he needed building up. Her serene assumption was that his hesitancy in advancing himself in business was based upon nothing more complex than laziness.

"Sari was deficient in sensitivity. Her ability to sense the feelings of others, her capacity to give and receive affection were blunted in her childhood. She had a cold, imperceptive mother, who gave presents but withheld affection, convinced her child that material things were the equivalent of love. Then, too, in her youth Sari's family moved so often that she had no friendships. She lost interest early in trying to understand and feel close to other people.

"Sari scoffed when John remarked on her strong resemblance to her mother. But it wasn't difficult to establish this resemblance. Her own description of her actions and feelings pointed up the deadly parallels. Sari definitely didn't want to be like her mother. Once she peered into the psychological mirror, she undertook the laborious task of changing her personality. She catalogued the undesirable qualities in her mother which were repeated in her own personality and went to work to eliminate them. This project, I might say, required many months. Sari tried with all her might to become more aware and more observant.

"Naturally she used her observation and awareness in studying her relationship with John. On evenings when he appeared to be tired—previously she simply hadn't noticed—she refrained from requesting that he hustle outside to paint the garage or weed the garden. She also refrained from calling in her father to pinch-hit. She acknowledged that playing off her father against her husband had been not only unkind but unsuccessful. When she stopped enlisting her father's assistance,

CONTINUED ON PAGE 153

What does the Gardener do in Summer?

Various ways to outwit the weeds and other unwanteds

By THE GARDENER'S ASSISTANT

Do you see what I see happening to the once peaceable pursuit of gardening? I get the feeling that it is fast assuming the character of chemical warfare, being waged bitterly between property owners and pests, both animal and vegetable. Garden stores look more and more like arsenals, with their stock piles of death-dealing devices, while garden literature grows more and more aggressive, concentrating increasingly on all manner of direful compounds and massive retaliation techniques that are lethal not only to weeds, worms and blights, but to some of gardening's best friends, such as ladybugs, and, what's worse, to ourselves. I am tempted at times to take the vows of organic gardening (the way people are impelled to become implacable pacifists), and I would, if to do so I didn't have to become so dedicated to the idea.

Now don't be suspicious. I'm as alert as anyone else to the menace of crab grass. My record will show that I have always been against allowing crab grass in the lawn. What I'm saying is simply that as far as the encroachments of crab grass and other subversive plants are concerned, I am inclined to blame our own incompetence and carelessness. If our lawns had been properly prepared in the first place, and then properly cared for, there would be no crab grass, plantain or dandelion problems now. As I hope in a month or so to go all out on the subject of lawns, I will only point out now that in a tightly integrated turf the lawn is as safe from attack, almost, as though the millennium had arrived.

Let us leave the loathsome subject of crab grass for a paragraph or two and consider some of gardening's other nuisances. Weeds have been defined as unwanted plants, and pests as undesirable animals. Yet I must admit that I am devoted, for instance, to both dandelions and deer. Where we live, the deer in the spring devour the tender sprouting leaves of the tulips as fast as they appear above the ground. Yet when I suggest to the gardener that we spray the tulip leaves with something which is supposed to make the deer spit out the leaves and go shuddering away, she won't hear of it, even though the label assures us that the contents of the can are harmless. Instead, she plants the tulips closer and closer to the house, where the deer's timidity prevents its approach.

Suburban and rural gardeners are well aware that rabbits adore petunias and are nearly as fond of geraniums as I am of rabbits. For these irresistible pests we have discovered a remarkably effective deterrent. It comes coiled in a can with its name in large letters, and is called Repellent Rope. It is treated with creosote, and you lay it along the edge of the flower bed, where it is quite inconspicuous, at least to the eye. Don't throw away the can. Left casually in view, it makes a momentary conversation piece.

Now that the nuisance insects are raising their resistance to poisonous powders and sprays, requiring these preparations to be made more and more potent, it is a pleasure to report that by reverting last summer entirely to rotenone products, which are perfectly harmless except to their specified particular prey, we were able to keep everything in the garden as well under control as anyone but an out-and-out fanatic could want. What's more, you can still buy rotenone preparations at the store. And you don't have to keep them out of reach of the baby, the puppy or the kittens either.

Dent de lion it was called by some Frenchman who thought the leaf looked like the teeth of a lion. I have eaten the dandelion's tender spring-green foliage in salads and have had it prepared à la spinach, and I like it both ways for its fine astringent flavor. And of course, when given the opportunity, all children delight in picking the dandelion's delicate seed puffs and blowing the downy fluff to fly in a hundred harmful directions. Then only recently I read that in the fall the roots can be cut and dried and sold for medicinal purposes in drugstores. Yet an awful lot of lawn lovers look down upon the dandelion with inordinate disfavor. All right, let them lean down instead, for the dandelion is much too smart for the lawn mower, and with a long-bladed knife let them carefully release the root entire from the earth. If they don't want the salad or the "greens" or even the medicine, at least both the lawn lover and the lawn will have benefited from the bending.

If you prefer, you can spot-kill dandelions, plantains and the like with one neat injection each from what might be called a hypodermic cane, and the risk you run with the poison is inconsequential as far as your other plants and pets are concerned. But when it comes to crab grass and its crawling companions, the only reasonably likely way to rid your lawn of these really irritating intruders, apart from pulling them out by hand when the ground is soft enough to let go of their roots, is either by taking the trouble to provide some kind of shade (crab grass hates the shade) or by spreading or spraying a chemical application over the whole infected area. Now I know it is an unpopular opinion to hold, but I still would leave herbicides to expert appliers who are willing to guarantee the success of their operation. Without experience, you run too many risks of failure and disappointment.

Outwitting the weeds in the garden is nothing compared with the lawn; it's so easy to get at them. Weeds will grow wherever the ground is uncovered and uncultivated. If you don't care to keep constantly cultivating the ground, then cover it with a mulch. One of the best mulches I know, and certainly the neatest and most attractive, is buckwheat hulls. You buy them in 100-pound bags, which is enough to share with your neighbors, and you'll find they last for years. They save watering as well as weeding.

If you want to know about organic gardening, why ladybugs are good for us, where to get buckwheat hulls or Repellent Rope and what garden sprays are harmless to humans and animals, send a stamped addressed envelope to me at the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL Garden Project, Frenchtown, New Jersey.

If there are any other animals that annoy the gardener, repellents are obtainable now for each and all, as the catalogues and garden counters attest. Yet a good garden game can be played without repellents. It is called matching wits with a mole; much better than poison bait or traps, if you have any compassion for your pets. You place a chair across the mole's run and sit there quietly with a sharp spade poised ready to slice down ahead of him as he comes crawling along like an egg in a stocking. He is easy to catch alive. The real question is one for your conscience: On whose land to leave him?

In September:
WHAT DOES THE GARDENER DO IN THE FALL?

IT'S FUN TO 'PHONE!

Turn a few minutes into fun by calling a friend or loved one. Whether it's down the street, or across the country, a sunny get-together makes the day a lot brighter. Lonely feelings are laughed away by a cheerful visit by telephone.

So treat yourself to a welcome break and just for fun—call someone!

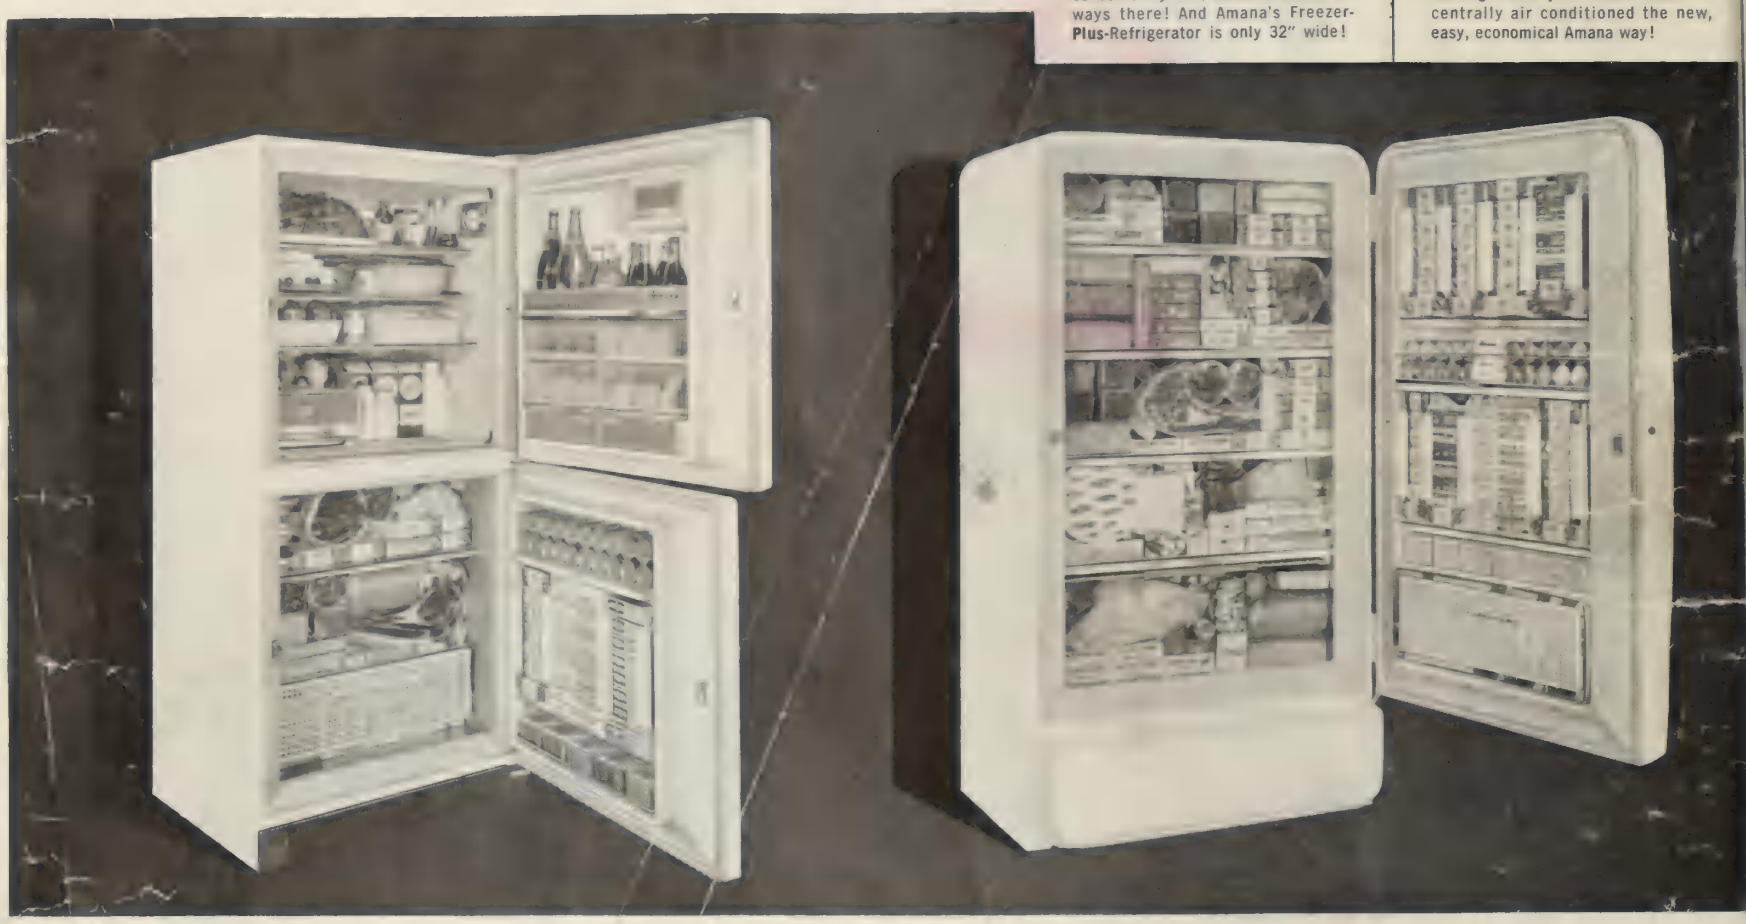
BELL TELEPHONE SYSTEM

Choice of America's smartest homemakers

Amana

Famous for Quality

Amana Room Air Conditioners mean cool, dry comfort for the whole family. You sleep and rest well, no matter how hot it is outside!



Your Amana Plan delivers just what you order! Finest meats; choicest vegetables, fruit juices. It's a supermarket right in your kitchen!

What fun! Store all the food you can conveniently use, with ice cream always there! And Amana's Freezer-Plus-Refrigerator is only 32" wide!

Heat, humidity, dust and pollen mean nothing when your entire home is centrally air conditioned the new, easy, economical Amana way!

Stunning new Freezer-Plus-Refrigerator! New Amana Style-Line gives you smart Built-In Look, without expensive installation cost! Spacious, self-defrosting refrigerator with convenient roll-out shelves, roomy Stor-Mor Door! Plus, genuine Amana upright freezer section, holds 263 lbs. of frozen food . . . at even 0°, always! Both in just 32" of floor space! Handsomely trimmed in blush pink and sand beige. A 16 cubic foot supermarket in your kitchen! Also available in superb 14 and 18 cubic foot models. Normally, your present refrigerator more than covers down payment!

The Amana Plan—Supermarket In Your Home! The world-famous Amana Plan For Better Living means thriftier budgets through supermarket specials, quantity buying. End menu monotony forever with Amana Stor-Mor Freezer, featuring exclusive Amana-matic freezing, 2½ times faster! Each shelf, plus top and bottom, a prime freezing surface, food stays at even 0° always! Exclusive Stor-Mor Door holds 116 packages of frozen food with fingertip convenience. You pay no more for Amana Quality . . ."Guaranteed to Outperform All Others." Investigate this wonderful way of life for yourself!

Amana®
BACKED BY A CENTURY-OLD TRADITION OF FINE CRAFTSMANSHIP

Finest Room Air Conditioning You Can Buy! Highest-standard Amana refrigeration principles are soundly built into these outstanding air conditioners! Traditional Amana engineering quality insures whisper-quiet operation! And these highest capacity air conditioners also dehumidify, exhaust stale air, and, Year 'Round models, thermostatically heat or cool room to exact setting! Prices for every purse, models for every home, capacity for every climate.

Remember, you pay no premium for world-famous Amana quality, so see these Amana products at your dealer's soon • Room Air Conditioners • Central System Air Conditioning • Freezer-Plus-Refrigerator and the world-renowned Stor-Mor Freezer that is . . .

GUARANTEED TO OUTPERFORM ALL OTHERS • AMANA REFRIGERATION, INC. • AMANA 4, IOWA

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 150

John's interest in co-operative chores gradually revived."

"When John was less harassed by visits from his father-in-law," said the other counselor, "he felt less need to turn to his own parents for emotional support. He and Sari had been seeing too much of both sets of in-laws. They began saving their weekends for themselves, dedicating those precious hours to fun and recreation and never mind the chores. Sari stopped feeling sinful about having a good time, another heritage from her mother. She and John profited from their leisure, developed a closer association with their children and became better parents.

"The fact was, as John had detected but vainly pointed out, a good bit of Sari's frenetic energy was expended on mere 'busy' work. Like her mother, Sari had regarded temperature-running activity as a virtue in itself. Few of the jobs she took during her marriage were financially productive. Her practice of choosing a home with the idea of remodeling the house and then selling it for a higher price (her mother's practice) had also been unprofitable. Sometimes she and John made a little profit, but the real cost was great. They never had a feeling of peace and permanence.

"In the course of our counseling, John put the two-family house on the market. When it was sold he and Sari invested in a house that suited their needs, pleased them both and required very few repairs. They intend to remain in their present location indefinitely and to put down roots. Nowadays Sari isn't snubbing her neighbors but is trying to befriend and get along with them.

"John's business difficulties began to clear up even before the unsatisfactory house was sold. He reluctantly awoke to the realization that his warmhearted but ambitious mother, who had stimulated and inspired his younger brother, had depressed him and made him feel unsure of his abilities.

"Because of his fondness for her, John hadn't realized that his mother had been the dominant and dominating member of his family. Once he understood this, he perceived that he had almost automatically yielded to Sari, allowed her to push him around and make decisions, because, as a child, he had become accustomed to yielding to the female—his mother—in the house. After talking many hours together—John put forth the effort and did talk—the couple agreed they must smash their old patterns.

"John's habit of falling into stony silence, unconsciously adopted from his patient father, had neither checked Sari's angry criticisms nor quelled their battles. On the contrary, his silence had quite often driven her into a hysterical frenzy of frustration and rage. If John was honestly seeking peace, he was assuredly going about it the wrong way. It would be better for him and Sari, for their particular personalities and particular marriage, they both agreed, if he removed the padlock from his tongue and emotions, communicated his thoughts and feelings and let fly with heated words when justifiably angered. Sometimes anger can clear the air.

"Slowly Sari's attitude toward John changed. She decided he was a good husband and that she was not a paragon as a wife. Her aggressiveness, she realized, had damaged both John and herself. She told John that she intended to stop working and to depend on him to be the breadwinner—and she was as good as her word. She didn't fight his decision to seek a selling job. She encouraged him. John's psychosomatic illnesses vanished.

"Nearly two years ago John found a job he still holds. Nowadays, more often than not, he talks to Sari about his business problems. She keeps her suggestions to a minimum. Since John enjoys selling and has a definite talent at public relations, he is doing unusually well. Sari has almost forgotten that she once put John under intolerable pressures. She and John are happy in themselves and with their children, satisfied with what they have and content to live in the now."

Editors' Note: This case history was compiled and condensed from actual records by DOROTHY CAMERON DISNEY

GROWING UP TO BE KING

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 53

last autumn, but the queen did ask special permission for his one real chum, David Daukes, to visit Windsor Castle with Charles for Sunday midday dinner. Ten-year-old David—whose father, Col. John Daukes, is attached to N.A.T.O.'s Paris staff—sat between Charles and Princess Anne across the dining-room table from the queen and Prince Philip to eat roast beef and Yorkshire pudding in the castle's Oak Room. Then they all tramped the grounds in rubber boots before the boys were driven back to school.

The little prince is now used to the uneasy distinction of being held on a tighter financial rein than most other boys. His parents keep him to the twenty-five-shillings-a-term pocket money (roughly $3.60, or thirty cents a week) that the school recommends. Some of the chaps tease him about this "stingy" allowance being "all wrong for the future king of England."

The pinch of poverty was briefly interrupted by his first registered letter, delivered shortly before his mother and father left for their transatlantic trip. At Cheam, a registered letter before parents go abroad usually means extra spending money. It did in this case. Charles and David were allowed a mild celebration.

They took off for the tuck shop, known as "The Bank," which is a small pantry off the kitchen. "The Bank" is presided over by good-looking, thirty-year-old Margaret Cowlieshall, referred to behind her back by Charles and his fellows as "Slim." She stocks the pantry with candy and chocolate, which are sold on a credit, not cash, basis, and all tuck boxes sent in by parents must be stored there. Each Wednesday and Saturday, every boy is allowed to buy a four-ounce ration of sweets. At term end if anything is left of the boy's allowance, "Slim" returns it to him in cash. Any refund for Charles is unlikely. Like his mother and grandmother, Queen Mother Elizabeth, he has a weakness for candy.

In her pursuit of his happiness, the queen has put a stop to any further instruction in "being royal." As a ten-year-old, she had to study the three R's; the British Constitution; the history of the British monarchy, Commonwealth and the United States. Queen Mary familiarized her granddaughter with all the branches of the family tree, and George VI kept his daughter beside his desk whenever he could as his working apprentice.

Charles will be free of extracurricular studies at least until he goes to a British public school at twelve or thirteen, perhaps until he moves on to a university five or six years after that. He will also take no more lessons standing up. This novel educational hazard was dreamed up for him and his sister, Anne, in his Buckingham Palace schoolroom days. The theory was that as a man he would be forced, like all British royalty, to spend so much time on his feet that he should be trained by standing at his lessons for twenty minutes every day.

The list of changes ordered for Charles against the advice of most members of her court adds up to a break with her own past as well as with British traditions. Until she decided to give her son opportunities she'd never had, Elizabeth had usually asked herself and her advisers, "How would my father have handled this?" She was unwilling to do anything he hadn't done. Yet, discovering that life can hold more than duty and destiny, she wanted to spare Charles the isolation and loneliness of her childhood.

The bubbling-up kind of happiness most children know eluded the little princess from the day her father became king and she his heiress presumptive, aged ten. She was raised in a tradition which held that royal children must be secluded from the world and drilled like Life Guards for future tasks. Not until she had a family of her own did she recognize some flaws in her own upbringing. Then her eyes were opened to danger signals in Charles.

At eight, he was a thumb sucker; she had been a nail chewer at ten. He frowned too much and smiled too little. He was lonely in the palace, which is more a museum than a home. He had no friends outside the tightly restricted court circle: Lord and Lady Rupert Neville's children, Guy and Angela; the sons of Lady Margaret Hay, who is one of the queen's ladies in waiting.

His mother is probably the only fellow mortal who can appreciate the special problems of being Prince Charles. "I know how he feels," she has often said, "because I feel that way myself." He has inherited her amiability, tension and innate shyness. The usual, close mother-and-firstborn relationship is shadowed by the macabre truth, which will inevitably dawn on him as it once overwhelmed her, that only the death of his parent enables a sovereign to succeed to the job he is trained and educated for.

Up to the time he went to prep school, there was growing criticism among many Britons of Charles' upbringing. The queen was blamed for submitting him so strictly to protocol that he was forbidden to run in public to hug or kiss her. His manners were ridiculed as being a fop's, his haircuts as being girlish. He lived, the complainers said, in a world of women—nanny, nurses and governess. He was treated, grumbled the influential left-wing weekly, the New Statesman, "as if he were a race horse in training for the Derby instead of a normal little boy."

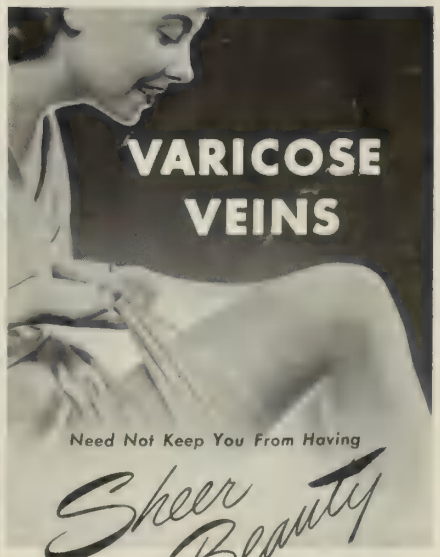
It remained for Lord Altrincham, in his pungent commentary on what he called the "priggish schoolgirl" aspect of the queen's personality, to demand: "Will she see to it that Prince Charles is equipped with all the knowledge he can absorb without injury to his health and that he mixes during his formative years with children who will one day be bus drivers, dockers, engineers, and so on—not merely with future landowners and stockbrokers?"

Philip diagnosed his son's most pressing need: he was starved for companionship of his own kind. That could be remedied by putting him into school. The queen reluctantly agreed it was worth trying. Though it ranked as a family decision and therefore not subject to anybody else's approval, the old guard at court was dismayed. Royal children had always been tutored at home before.

ALWAYS ROOM FOR ONE MORE

By ELIZABETH GRAHAM

I've a briddy bad code,
Bud ibv you will excudez be,
I will judz speag by piedz
Before id eloodz be.



You cabe do our bardy
Uninvided, idz drue,
Dode joke abvder joke
Aboud salesben you knew;

Drang ride frub our bunch bowl,
Stayed log abvder four;
Bud ad our houdz there's alwaydz
Roob for wud bore.

® Trade Mark of Wilbert W. Haase Co.

Don't Neglect Slipping
FALSE TEETH
Do false teeth drop, slip or wobble when you talk, eat, laugh or sneeze? Don't be annoyed and embarrassed by such handicaps. FASTEETH, an alkaline (non-acid) powder to sprinkle on your plates, keeps false teeth more firmly set. Gives confident feeling of security and added comfort. No gummy, gooey, pasty taste or feeling. Get FASTEETH today at drug counters everywhere.

Need Not Keep You From Having Sheer Leg Beauty
See the new Super Extra-Sheer Bell-Horn Tropical Weight Elastic Stockings at all Department, Surgical and Drug Stores. Tropical Weight Stockings are the sheerest made which give the correct support for varicose veins.
BELL-HORN
TROPICAL WEIGHT
ELASTIC HOSIERY
BELL-HORN, 451 N. 3rd St., Phila. 23, Pa.
Send FREE BOOKLET: VARICOSE VEINS
NAME _____
ADDRESS _____ X
Leading Makers of Elastic Hosiery for Over 100 Years

The Opposite Sex and Your Perspiration

By Valda Sherman

Did you know there are two kinds of perspiration? "Physical," caused by work or exertion; and "nervous," stimulated by emotional excitement.

Doctors say that this "emotional perspiration" is the big offender in underarm stains and odor. It is caused by special glands that are bigger, more powerful, pour out more perspiration. And this kind of perspiration causes the most offensive odor.

Science has discovered that a deodorant needs a special ingredient specifically formulated to overcome this offensive "emotional perspiration" odor. And now it's here . . . the remarkable ingredient Perstop*—the most effective, yet the gentlest odor-stopping ingredient ever discovered—and available only in the new cream deodorant ARRID.

Use ARRID daily and you'll be amazed how quickly this new ARRID with Perstop* penetrates deep into the pores and stops this "emotional perspiration" odor. Stops it as no roll-on, spray-on, or stick could ever do.

You rub ARRID in—rub perspiration out . . . rub ARRID in—rub odor out. When the cream vanishes, you know you are safe, even when you are nervous or stimulated by emotional excitement. Doctors have proved that this new ARRID with Perstop* is actually 1½ times as effective as all leading deodorants tested.

Remember—nothing protects you like a cream . . . and no cream protects you like ARRID with Perstop*. So don't be half-safe. Be completely safe. Use ARRID with Perstop* to be sure. Only 43¢ plus tax.

*Carter Products trademark for sulfonated hydrocarbon surfactants.

Wedding Questions?

The New Emily Post's Etiquette is the only standard guide to weddings. $5.50 at all bookstores.

FUNK & WAGNALLS

MONEY . . .
In Your Free Time

Spare-time income can help you meet expenses. Write for details about our subscription-selling plan. No obligation.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa.

Now! In just one step you can creme rinse and set silkier, springier curls!

Here's your chance to stop using those sticky, dulling hair sprays forever!

MARY RICHARDSON, Richard Hudnut Beauty Consultant

If you're dissatisfied with sprays that make your hair seem dry and straw-like . . . if you're disgusted with the way they leave it sticky or dull or coated with ugly flakes—then here's wonderful news for you! It's Richard Hudnut's latest discovery, a creme rinse and set, all in one.

Curls last day after day

Just think of it! Now in one easy step, you can rinse in glorious new highlights, caressable new softness—and set curls that stay lively day after day! Even fine, fly-away hair has a silky new manageability, actually springs into place under your comb! Yet Richard Hudnut's exciting new Creme Rinse 'n Set never leaves hair dry and dull-looking as most sprays do. No trace of flakiness! No stickiness!

Easiest creme rinse ever

Richard Hudnut's Creme Rinse 'n Set is the easiest creme rinse you've ever used! There's no mixing with water, no rinsing out as with all other creme rinses. After shampooing, just shake on Creme Rinse 'n Set, comb it through and set your hair the usual way. That's all you have to do for silky, shining curls! Curls that last and last, right up to your very next shampoo!

You'll love Creme Rinse 'n Set by Richard Hudnut. Try it right away! $.60, $1.00 and $1.75 plus federal tax at cosmetic counters everywhere.

She found what she wanted in a small, new, private day school, the Hill School, in Knightsbridge, a short drive from the palace. The headmaster gave her the assurance she needed: "The most important thing at the start of his school career is that a boy should be happy. This is a very happy school."

In his busier, fuller days as a Hill schoolboy, Charles improved visibly. His mother was ready to be persuaded by Philip to take a second long stride toward providing Charles with an average childhood. He could be emancipated completely from the atmosphere of nursery, nannies and cambric tea, and entered for Cheam.

He found a difference as drastic as an ice-water dunking. Instead of being ushered to bed by a nanny, he now sleeps with eight others in one of eleven uncarpeted dormitories, on a battered century-old wooden bedstead. A hard, unsprung flock mattress covers unyielding wooden slats. With no servant to help him do anything, he has acquired the knack of making his own bed as soon as he leaves it at 7:15 A.M. weekdays, 7:45 A.M. on Sundays. He scrubs himself, unsupervised, clean enough to line up for hands-and-ears inspection from the matron, who signifies a passing grade with a brisk, "Good morning, Prince Charles," and a handshake.

After prayers in their classrooms, the boys file past the headmaster to shake hands again before going in for breakfast. Peter Beck, boyishly jovial at forty-eight, is a great believer in handshaking. "It gives the boys confidence," he says. "It does them good to be looked in the eye and addressed for a change by their Christian names." The young prince, lacking a surname for everyday purposes, is waiting to have a nickname tagged on him.

At eight o'clock sharp, he tackles breakfast in the dining room, sitting at a bare wooden table under the glassy stare of three stags' heads and one fox mask mounted on the walls. A typical start to the day consists of hot porridge, steamed fish, bread and butter, marmalade or jam.

Four hours of lessons fill the morning. Now that Charles and his eleven fellow mealy eyes have settled in, Latin is being added to the basic curriculum of elementary French, English, arithmetic, mathematics, history and geography, taught by a staff of nine masters, a governess and an art-and-music mistress.

One-o'clock luncheon is the day's big meal, served from the old-fashioned, well-scoured kitchens, which cater to hearty appetites rather than fussy eaters. After hot soup comes what the school's private vocabulary calls "Cheam stew," consisting usually of meat, boiled potatoes and two other vegetables. This is followed by "Cheam stodge," describing any kind of hot dessert. Charles' favorites are treacle duff and rice pudding.

Afternoons are taken up by games and two more lesson periods, except on Wednesdays and Saturdays, which are given over wholly to sports. The prince has made a name as a useful soccer fullback. Thanks to his father's home coaching, he is also a fair hand at cricket and swimming.

Six-o'clock tea puts bread and jam, cake and cocoa on the tables. On really cold days, hot soup and rolls are added before the boys climb upstairs to bed on a timetable that sends the youngest up at 7:15 P.M., which is Charles' bedtime. He sleeps like a log on his planklike bed, though some British mattress manufacturers have protested that flock paillasses are too Spartan for the royal heir.

The dormitory is unheated throughout the winter. During afternoons, the door is left open so that warmth from the corridor can raise the temperature a few degrees, but at night the windows must be left open, no matter what the weather outside. Nobody gets a hot-water bottle.

Like his mother and father, Charles is a television fan. Cheam's common room houses a set, but programs are limited to sports and education—no Westerns, not even "Robin Hood." Also in the common room he can read three carefully selected comic books—and Punch.

For the Beach . . .

A CHILD'S TERRY-CLOTH ROBE

Pink and blue terry cloth combine to make this "half-and-half" pull-over robe. A single pattern piece is adjustable from size 4 to 10. Elastic at neckline and cuffs. To order, ask for Pattern No. 2927, and send 15c to: Reference Library, Ladies' Home Journal, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania.*

*Pennsylvania residents please add sales tax.

SCHOOLS

Girls' Schools

Grove A Friends' School for Girls. Emphasizes Preparation for College and Purposeful Living. Music, Art, Speech. Grades Broadening interests of international enrollment, included. Indoor ring. Winter Sports Featured Experts. Beautiful new fireproof Quadrangle.
d Mrs. Robert Owen, Box 128, Vassalboro, Maine

Katharine's School Episcopal. Fully accredited. Scholastic, al, spiritual training. College preparatory. Individual ce with full testing program. Fine arts with Ballet. th Grades. Small classes. Sports include Golf, ning, Riding. Write for Catalog and "The Sampler".
Walter L. Lemley, Headmaster, Davenport, Iowa

rles E. Ellis School Girls, grades 6–12. MSA accredited.
e preparatory, art, music, home economics, secretar- nall classes. Individual guidance. 300-acre campus, n stone buildings, suburban Phila. Separate dorms for r girls. Sports, riding. Gymnasium. Est. 1910. Catalog. old E. Look, Ph. D., Pres., Newtown Square 14, Pa.

mper Hall
girls mental, spiritual, moral and physical training scious, successful living. College preparation; opportes in Music, Dramatics and Fine Arts including ics. Jr. School. 88th Yr. Under direction of Sisters Mary (Episcopal). Write Box J, Kenosha, Wis.

ford School for Girls Accredited college preparation in ideal round climate. Open air classes. Music, art, dras, secretaryship. Character and personality develin friendly home life. Sports, riding. Endowed. ed enrollment. Catalog. Lucinda de L. Templin, h.D., Principal, 4701 Austin Terrace, El Paso, Texas

Junior Colleges

bler Junior College A Division of Temple University 1910 as Pa. School of Horticulture. Majors in Land- Design & Horticulture with Lib. Arts. A.S. degree. ts transferable. 150 acres nr. Phila. Greenhouses, garnurseries, orchards, horse stables as student labs. ities. Placement service. Box L, Ambler, Pa.

den Hall
r College and School for Girls. Cultural and Voca- l. Music, Home Economics, Secretarial Studies. Fine Commercial Art. Dramatic Art. Preparatory and Gen- Courses. All sports. Riding. Swimming Pool. Moderate n. Address: Byron K. Horne, D.D., Box 76, Lititz, Pa.

erett College
irls, fully accredited. Transfer, terminal. Liberal Arts. rofessional courses. Merchandising, home ec., secret- l, med. sec'l. Music, art, drama. Individual attention, classes. Sports, pool, gym. Endowed. 99th yr. Catalog. tis Bishop, President, 424 W. Main St., Danville, Va.

Airline School

Grace Downs TRAINING BRINGS GOOD POSITIONS AND RAPID PROMOTIONS

airline executives rate Grace Downs School finest in the country. Here, young men and n learn during day and evening classes in a sphere cabin. Students simulate flying in the l's giant Link Trainer. Airline executives interview prospective yes right on school premises. In 1956, Grace Downs placed 99% graduates. FREE placement. State Licensed. Get book MC.
GRACE DOWNS Air Career School
77 First Ave., New York 16, N. Y. OR 9-6440
Supervised Dormitories in Luxurious School Building

Special School

e Training School at Vineland, N.J.
ppy, useful life for retarded boys and girls 2 years and ith mental potential of 6 years. School, hospital, lake, s, farm on 1600 acres. Homelike cottages. Academic, tional training. All therapies. Summer session. Write:
Box S, The Training School at Vineland, N. J.

Music

erwood Music School Train for a successful music career. Two- three-year certificate courses and four-year degree ses. Faculty of distinguished musicians. Member Nat. a. Schls. Mus. State accredited. Coed. Well-equipped ding on lakefront. Dormitory for women. Founded 1895. te for catalog. 1014 S. Michigan Ave., Chicago 5, Ill.

Fine & Applied Arts

y-Vogue Schools
hion Merchandising with Modeling. Dress Design, hion Illustration. Interior Decoration. Commercial Art; tography. Coed. Attractive residence for girls. Enter 1st of each mo. Write Registrar. Room 706. Specify course.
-Vogue Schools, 750 North Michigan Ave., Chicago 11

nerican Academy of Art ctical courses in Commercial & Fine Art. Faculty of in- ational reputation. Story, Advertising & Fashion Illus.; tering, Layout, Painting. Placement Service. Vet apved. Coed. Summer term begins June 23. Frank H. Young, Dept. 968, 30 East Adams Street, Chicago 3, Ill.

Business & Secretarial atharine Gibbs Secretarial. Outstanding training. Three practical courses: One-Year retarial, Liberal Arts-Secretarial (two years). Special rse for College Women. Residences. For catalog write: missions Dean, Boston 16, 21 Marlborough St.; New k 17, 230 Park Ave., Montclair, N.J., 33 Plymouth St.; vidence 6, 155 Angell St.

encerian College Coeducational. Est. 1863. Small classes. Work- dy plan. College life; social, athletic activities. In resial area. Earn B.B.A. degree in 2 yrs., 8 mos. in counting, General Business, Sales Management, A.A. in cutive, medical, legal, secretarial; court reporting. G.I. proved. Catalog. Registrar J, Milwaukee 10, Wisconsin

Home Study Schools

merican School High School at home. Many finish in 2 years. as rapidly as your time and abilities permit. Prepares college entrance exams. Standard H.S. texts supplied. ploma awarded. Credit for H.S. subjects already comted. Single subjects if desired. Free Bulletin.
erican School, Dept. HA3, Drexel at 58th, Chicago 37

HIGH SCHOOL at HOME
u can still finish High School—at home, in your spare time, interference with job, or social life. Win more pay, a better social recognition. Take only the subjects you need. Comte lesson and answer service. Personalized instruction. Low st. Diploma to graduates.
C.S. oldest and largest (257 courses). Write today for 3 free books: (1) 36-page "How to Succeed," (2) sample (Math), (3) Career Catalogue—indicate course desired.
ITERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS
CRANTON 15, PENNA. DEPT. 39196E

The prince's social life takes him on regular visits to the kitchens to call on Mrs. M. E. Cauillard, the cook. "Have you a few bones," he pleads, "so I can have a game?" The game is the ancient school pastime of knucklebones, predecessor of jacks. Five small pig's bones are held in your palm and tossed in the air with the aim of catching as many as possible on the back of your hand. Bones are frequently mislaid, accounting for Charles' courtship of the cook. He has outgrown the tamer games of snakes-and-ladders, ludo and draughts, which he used to play with his family in Buckingham Palace.

Twice a week he changes socks, shirt and underwear after taking the prescribed hot bath in the school's only bathroom. It measures a meager nine feet by fifteen feet and contains four small tubs under a wall sign commanding, "Silence in the Bathroom." With four small boys soaping and splashing simultaneously, the sign is extremely ineffective.

The bathroom was the scene of one battle royal which has noticeably raised Charles' social stature. During an afternoon visit by the school barber, who calls every three weeks and works in the bathroom, an older boy pushed Prince Charles' newly clipped head under a cold-water faucet and turned it on. Anguished shrieks reached clear to the dormitories—when he finds his voice it shakes the rafters, though he is inclined to mumble shyly in class. The two boys wrestled while the cold water filled the tub. Then Charles with a sudden heave managed to shove his persecutor into the bath—and fell in after him. They both escaped with a warning because Christmas wasn't far off.

BACK VIEW, SIZES AND PRICE OF VOGUE PATTERN ON PAGE 92

Vogue Design No. 9485. "Easy to Make" blouse, 10–20 (31–40). 60¢.

At end-of-term celebrations, Charles chanced his luck again. With three friends, he clambered up on top of the pipes in the drying room to ambush any schoolmates who passed below by dropping raincoats over their heads. As half-smothered boys struggled to get free, Charles and fellow conspirators jumped down and rushed out into the corridor. A master who was hurrying up to investigate narrowly escaped being run down.

News of her son's latest Tom Brown-style cutups sometimes comes to the queen by way of the seven morning newspapers she scans at breakfast. Some of those newspapers are speculating about the day he will first be summoned to Mr. Beck's study for the supreme penalty. He will certainly be caned if he deserves it, the headmaster has said. The queen would welcome a lot more privacy and a lot less public attention for Charles. With her blessing, the headmasters recently appealed to newspapers and sight-seers alike: "We ask very earnestly that you leave us alone. . . . Let us get on with the job of educating ninety little boys, which is a fairly full-time occupation."

The steady besieging of Cheam by curious citizens for private or professional reasons has persuaded the royal family to cling to one custom of the past which they'd hoped to discard. Charles still has his own "private eye," middle-aged Detective Sergeant Reginald Summers, who is uncomfortably quartered in an ancient, sparsely furnished cottage with a

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

THESE ADVERTISERS WILL BE GLAD TO SEND BULLETINS AND ARRANGE PERSONAL INTERVIEWS. IN WRITING, MENTION YOUR REQUIREMENTS.

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, 555 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, NEW YORK

Boys' Schools

PEEKSKILL ★ for Academic Preparedness

TO MEET TODAY'S EDUCATIONAL CHALLENGE

125th year marks intensified ACADEMIC PREPAREDNESS program for students of good or above average ability to advance to higher levels in Fundamentals including Mathematics, Sciences, and Foreign Language. This program which begins at 7th grade, also permits capable, interested students to enter at 8th, 9th & 10th grades. (11th & 12th filled).

Boys learn to study through interesting dynamic instruction, small classes, men teachers. Students advance in each subject according to their ability under flexible grouping.

Military training develops leadership and systematic habits of study and play. All Sports with expert coaching. Rifle team, Band, Glee Club, Social Life. Modern brick buildings, Swimming Pool, Gym.

Superior achievement records in College and Life. For catalog and "Why Fundamentals Early," write Box 406, PEEKSKILL MILITARY ACADEMY,
Peekskill-on-Hudson 4, N. Y. Tel 7-4520

STAUNTON MILITARY ACADEMY

In Beautiful Shenandoah Valley. Thorough college preparation; fully accredited. Individual guidance. Band. All sports. 2 gyms. Pool. Fine health record. Fireproof buildings. Separate Junior School. Illus. Catalog write Supt. S.M.A. Box J6, Staunton, Va.
BASIC COURSE R.O.T.C. BY U. S. ARMY INSTRUCTORS. Founded 1860

FORK UNION MILITARY ACADEMY

★ Our ONE SUBJECT PLAN of study in Upper School (grades 9–12) has increased honor roll 50%. Develops concentration. Fully accredited. ROTC highest rating. 17 modern buildings, 2 completely equipped gyms, 2 indoor pools. Splendid environment, excellent health record. Junior School (grades 4–8) has separate buildings, gym, pool, Housemothers. 60th year. For ONE SUBJECT PLAN booklet and catalog write:
Dr. J. C. Wicker, Box 866, Fork Union, Va.
★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Cheshire Academy Junior School. Grades 6 to 8. Thorough grounding in subjects anticipating college preparatory study on same campus. Emphasis on fundamentals. Flexible program for each boy develops good habits of concentration. Separate classes, dormitories, activities. Remedial instruction. Arthur J. Sheriff, Headmaster, Cheshire, Connecticut

Manlius
Founded 1869. For boys. Accredited. Grades 7–12. Complete college preparation. ROTC. Highest U.S. Army rating for over 50 years. 126-acre campus. Remedial reading. Sports. Band. Summer session. Tutorial assistance. Catalog.
Robert A. Weekes, The Manlius School, Manlius, N.Y.

Worcester Academy Boys prepared for increasingly difficult college entrance exams. Graduates in engineering, scientific schools. Grades 8–12. Preference given younger boys as college pressure requires thorough prep. Only few 1-yr. boys accepted. Nat'l. enrlmt. Est. 1834. Sports. Headmaster,
William S. Piper, Jr., 105 Providence St., Worcester, Mass.

Carteret School
Superior College prep. Accredited. 1st Grade to College. Small classes. Proper study habits. Reading Techniques. Shops. Homelike dormitory. Large gym. 40 acres atop Orange Mt. Moderate rate. New York trips 20 miles. Request booklet F-16. Carteret School, West Orange, N.J.

McDonogh A leading preparatory school for boys. Grades 1–12. Accredited. Prepares for all colleges, service academies. Small classes. Individual guidance. Music. Dairy and animal husbandry. Semi-military. Sports. 80 horses; 2 gyms, indoor pool. 835-acre country campus near Baltimore. Est. 1873. Catalog.
Robert L. Lamborn, Ed. D., Box 117, McDonogh, Maryland

Croydon Hall
For boys, Grades 3 through 12. Sound college preparation. Small classes. Strong remedial education program. Individual guidance and testing. Team sports. Riding, tennis, golf. Field trips. 45 acres. 40 miles from N.Y.C. Summer Session.
Dr. John J. Carr, Pres., Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey

Villanova Preparatory School
Boys' Residential Catholic High School. Est. 1924. College Preparatory. Fully Accredited. 9th to 12th Grades. 131 Acre Campus. Healthful Climate. Near Santa Barbara. All Sports. Fall Term Registration Now.
Augustinian Fathers, Route 2, Box 10, Ojai, California

Miami Military Academy Develops leadership and character. Fully accredited. College preparatory high school, Junior School. Small classes. Boys learn to study. National Defense Cadet Corps Honor School. Sports, sailing; pool. 35 acres on Biscayne Bay. Moderate fee. 33rd year. Catalog.
Col. F. R. Williams, 10603 Biscayne Blvd., Miami 38, Fla.

Junior Military Academy
Boys 4–14. Semi-military. Kindergarten–8th grade. Family life and affectionate care. Food from our own farm. 12 months' enrollment includes 4 weeks at Camp Whooppee. Enter any time. Moderate rate. 39th year. Catalog.
Maj. Roy DeBerry, Box L, Bloomington Springs, Tenn.

Massanutten Military Academy
59th yr. Accredited. New Dorm & classrooms. Small classes. College Preparatory. Supervised study. ROTC. Band, Rifle team, Riding, Tennis, Football, Basketball, Baseball. Athletics for all. Gym, Pool. Grades 6–12. Catalog. Col. R. J. Benchoff, Hdmr., Woodstock 4, Va. (Shenandoah Val.)

St. John's Military Academy Where boys become self-confident men. Accredited college preparation under the famous St. John's System. Grades 7–12. Inspired teaching. Small classes, individual attention. Reading Clinic. ROTC. Fireproof dorms. All sports. Summer Camp. 74th year. Catalog: Dir. of Admissions, Box 368, Delafield, Wis.

Northwestern Military & Naval Academy College prep. Est. 1888. Accredited. 75 mi. to Chicago, 55 to Milwaukee. Avg. class 10. Fireproof buildings. Modern facilities. 85 acres on lake. Sr. ROTC Basic. All sports; sailing. Summer Camp. Write for catalogs. 86 So. Lake Shore Rd., Lake Geneva, Wis.

Morgan Park Military Academy
Superior academic program under inspiring faculty. College preparatory, fully accredited. Small classes, grades 4–12. Honor ROTC; Rifle Team, Flying, Swimming, Band, Art, Music, Drama. Shop. Sports; teams for all. 86th yr. Catalog.
Supt., Box 1068, Morgan Park, Chicago 43, Illinois

Medical Technology

Franklin School of Science & Arts
Nationally famous for thorough training in Medical Technology—12 months; X-Ray Technology—6 months; Medical Secretary—12 months. Top paying positions waiting. Coed. Free Placements. Approved. Founded 1919. Send for Catalog A. 251 S. 22nd St., Phila. 3, Pa.

Northwest Institute of Medical Laboratory Technique Founded 1918. M. D. Faculty. Courses to 12 mos. in clinical laboratory, X-ray and EKG. Free placement service. Coed classes start Jan., Apr., July, Oct. G. I. approved. Catalog.
3418 E. Lake Street, Minneapolis 6, Minn.

The Sewanee Military Academy
Division Univ. of the South. Fully accredited. Grades 8–12. Small classes. Individual attention. Boys Taught to Study. ROTC Highest Rating. All sports; gym, indoor pool. 10,000-acre mountain domain. Episcopal. 91st year. Catalog.
Col. Craig Alderman, Supt., Box L, Sewanee, Tennessee

Tennessee Military Institute
Boys planning to attend engineering schools and leading colleges need thorough preparation. T.M.I. provides that foundation. Over 90% of graduates enter colleges. Grades 8–12. Small classes. Summer School. 85th year. Catalog.
Colonel C. R. Endsley, Jr., Pres., Box 810, Sweetwater, Tenn.

Greenbrier Military School
146th yr. The School of Achievement. 7th & 8th grades & H.S. and P.G. Dept. ROTC. 2300 ft. elev. White Sulphur Springs' golf & swim pool. Modern gym & new Rifle range. Athletics. Band, Glee Club. Summer Camp. For Catalog write D. T. Moore, Box J-606, Lewisburg 6, W. Va.

Augusta Military Academy
"The Friendly School." Distinguished ROTC school in Shenandoah Valley. Jr. & Sr. Divisions. Boys 8–20. Accredited; graduates in leading colleges. All sports—pool, gym. 1400 acres. Family owned since 1742. Rate $1200. Catalog. Col. Charles S. Roller, Box J, Ft. Defiance, Va.

Gordon Military College
Accredited. Grades 8–12. Also two years college. ROTC trains for military or civilian leadership. Supervised study. Stimulating activities program. 350 acres. Golf, all sports, pool. $995 inclusive rate. Founded 1852. Catalog.
Col. C. L. Harris, President, Barnesville, Georgia

Fishburne Military School
A distinguished military school for the young man seriously concerned with making adequate preparation for college entrance. Accredited since 1897. Grades 9–12. Highest ROTC rating. Summer School. Write for catalog.
Colonel E. P. Childs, Jr., Box E, Waynesboro, Virginia

The Miller School of Albemarle
Military. Grades 5–12. College preparatory plus industrial arts, iron & wood working, auto mechanics, machine shop & electricity. Endowed. Inclusive rate $1200. Sports. New gym. 1500 acres. Near Charlottesville. 80th year. Catalog.
Col. W. Hugh Flannagan, Dept. L, Miller School P.O., Va.

Wentworth Military Academy
Thousands of business and professional leaders started here. 4-yr. High School; separate 2-yr. College. Accred. Sr. ROTC. CAA flying. Modern bldgs., country club. Sports for all; pool. Summer school; also younger boys' camp. 79th yr. Catalog.
Col. J. M. Sellers, 1868 Washington Place, Lexington, Mo.

Kemper Military School
Rounded educational, military, recreational program. Century-old tradition; modern methods. Accredited. Small classes; personal guidance. 8th Grade, H.S. and Jr. College. Approved ROTC. All sports, pool; flying. 114th yr. Catalog. Dir. of Admissions, 1668 Third St., Boonville, Mo.

Roosevelt Military Academy
"Builders of Men." An outstanding educational institution. Fully accredited; Noted Guidance Department; small classes; personal supervision; free tutoring; all sports; band; riding. Moderate rate. Grades 5–12. Catalog:
Colonel Glen J. Millikan, Box J, Aledo, Ill.

Howe Military School
Academic training in spiritual environment. Accredited preparatory, business. Potential Achievement Rating gives individual goal. Jr. school. Sr. ROTC. Sports. New dorms and pool. Episcopal. Est. 1884. Summer Camp. Catalog.
Burrett B. Bouton, M.A., 1768 Academy Place, Howe, Ind.

Western Military Academy
Develops a desire to succeed. Emphasis on self-confidence, self-direction, how-to-study. Small classes, guidance. Grades 7–12. Career analysis. Jr.-Sr. R.O.T.C. All athletics: riding, pool. 80th yr. Near St. Louis. Catalog:
Col. Ralph B. Jackson, Supt., Box L-6, Alton, Illinois

Coeducational School

Judson School In Arizona. A coed ranch school. Grades 1 to 12. College Preparatory. Accredited. Beautiful location in Paradise Valley near Phoenix. Healthful, warm climate. Small classes. Riding & polo included in tuition. Tennis, swimming, pack trips, fishing, rodeos, riflery, roping, music. 30th year. Catalog.
David J. Wick, Headmaster, Scottsdale, Arizona

NEVIUS-VOORHEES
Trenton, N. J.

CULLUM'S
Augusta, Ga.

BRY'S
Memphis, Tenn.

JOHNSON, STEPHENS & SHINKLE SHOE CO., ST. LOUIS, MO.

SUNBURN?

for men–women–children

STOP THE PAIN WITH SOLARCAINE
Instantly!

Scorching pain vanishes almost instantly with Solarcaine—the medicated lotion recommended by so many doctors! Developed in the blazing tropics, Solarcaine's unique formula soothes and cools damaged tissues, stops the pain, and helps speed healing! No more agonizing hours of discomfort. It's greaseless, too—and will not stain.

At drug counters everywhere

SOLARCAINE

Use SOLARCAINE LIP BALM for Chapped Lips, Fever Blisters, Cold Sores

stone floor, at the back of the main buildings. While his ward is in school, Summers patrols the grounds. At the Christmas concert, he lurked in the hall while Charles, on stage with his cap jammed over his ears, sang carols with the choir.

Charles' antics have become a sort of national joke, which is told freely even in the presence of his parents and royal relatives. At a Windsor Castle staff party, Princess Margaret watched a professional ventriloquist make his dummy, decked out in Cheam cap and blazer, weep and wail, "I'm sorry my end-of-term report was such a shocker, but I did jolly well at sports, didn't I?"

At the Royal Variety Show, a gang of slapstick comedians kept the London Palladium rocking with laughter at a Prince Charles skit. When one of them, dressed as a Cheam schoolboy, complained in a thick cockney accent about his bed, three planks were flung out into the orchestra. When Elizabeth and Philip arrived, a bulbous-nosed comic in mortarboard and gown was gravely introduced as "the headmaster." "Looks just like him too," grinned Philip. The queen turned on her warm smile.

Though his skirmishes as related by the newspapers have taken on some of the flavor of a continuing comic strip, Britain has become a nation of affectionately critical aunts and uncles where Charles is concerned. He is a kind of national sporting hero, and the only public criticism you hear centers on his haircuts, which are still considered "sissy" by some parents. Adverse comment about the queen has at the same time faded to a whisper.

But Charles' rough-and-tumble education remains a sore point with most members of the court. Philip in particular is blamed for changing his wife's attitudes toward herself and their children, for allowing their son to be brought up so much in his father's footsteps. It seems likely that she cannot make many more changes in their family life, cannot "streamline the monarchy" as Philip would like her to, without running into respectful resistance from the Establishment.

The Establishment is a vague but powerful grouping of the right-wing peers, 90 per cent of the court, the Church of England's dignitaries, and the universities. As Britain's stronghold of traditionalism, the Establishment regards any discussion of change in the monarchy outside its own tight circle as wellnigh treasonable.

The Establishment's acknowledged leader is Robert Arthur James Gascoyne-Cecil, fifth Marquess of Salisbury. This aristocrat of aristocrats has been the greatest single influence on Elizabeth as queen in the past, in contrast with Philip's influence on her as a woman, wife and mother. Salisbury, known as "Bobbety" to his intimates, is a Cecil, a member of that family of blue bloods which has been putting its stamp on British affairs ever since Henry VIII granted them a fat share of lands he had confiscated.

Bobbety made his power keenly felt after Princess Margaret had set her heart on Peter Townsend. Salisbury had turned his somber face against any such marriage from the start of the romance. The end came—and the Establishment wholeheartedly approved—with Margaret's forlorn announcement: "I would like it to be known that I have decided not to marry Group Captain Peter Townsend."

When Elizabeth and Philip made up their minds on marriage, George VI looked to Salisbury for advice. The marquess shared the king's initial disapproval for this landless Greek prince. It took the combined efforts of the now Queen Mother Elizabeth, Queen Mary and Philip's uncle, Lord Louis Mountbatten, to convince King George that the marriage would work.

Lord Salisbury, a director of the Westminster Bank, has valued his family's worth at more than $15,000,000, securely diversified between banking, brewing and luscious real estate. His address is Hatfield House, Hertfordshire, a red brick Elizabethan palace set in a great deer park; its gallery, armory, library, chapel and endless corridors bulge with historical records and relics. The marquess was young enough at seventeen to serve as train bearer at George V's coronation, mature enough in his early forties to have a leading part in forcing the abdication of Edward VIII.

A palace observer, in a moment of frankness recently, said, "Lord Salisbury always had tremendous influence over the late king and the queen mother. He was always the most influential person at court. His advice was always sought by King George the Sixth. Quite naturally, the present queen fell under his spell."

In conversation, he is amiably sarcastic and sufficiently unbending to lend credence to the London legend that "a Cecil never smiles except when another Cecil enters the room." By birth and marriage, he is related to half the nobility of Britain—he married Betty Cavendish, niece of the Duke of Devonshire—and six relatives are to be found in Harold Macmillan's present Cabinet. Salisbury was called in by the queen as her first adviser—the second was Sir Winston Churchill—on whom she should name as successor to Sir Anthony Eden as Prime Minister. When the country was certain "Rab" Butler was the inevitable choice, Salisbury spoke for Macmillan, and Macmillan got the job.

Bobbety has made enemies with his aloof air of knowing indisputably what is right for his queen and country. When he resigned as the government's Leader of the House of Lords last summer, his opponents speculated that his influence over Elizabeth might be eclipsed by the Mountbattenites.

The leader of this faction is the man both the queen and Philip call "Uncle Dickie"—Earl Mountbatten of Burma. As a schoolboy, Philip adopted his dashing, charming, ambitious relative as a father. Dickie Mountbatten was the last great-grandchild born during the lifetime of Queen Victoria. Legend says that he first showed his disregard for convention by knocking off her glasses during his christening at Frogmore House, in the grounds of Windsor Castle.

Like Salisbury, Mountbatten has been adviser to kings. He was an intimate of Edward VIII and one of the "King's Party" which regarded abdication as the wrong solution to the problem of Mrs. Simpson. Yet only months after George VI had been enthroned, Dickie Mountbatten was readmitted to the inner court. Whereas Salisbury has been a matchbreaker, Mountbatten was a matchmaker. He saw to it that his handsome young ward, Philip, met Elizabeth as a child, and he fostered their romance. On a personal level, Uncle Dickie and his forward-looking wife, Edwina, are probably closer to the queen and Philip than any other couple in England.

A British commentator recently singled out the weakness of the ultraconservative Salisbury as a future influence on Eliza
"What is perhaps least certain about h whether he has an idea of what Britain's should be in the world in contrast to Bri place in the world as it was."

On the other hand, the Mountbattenite joy two great and growing advantages.
understand, in the words of a veteran Lo observer, "that royalty is no longer a wa of power in an age of mass production, information and mass voting, and come to terms with the masses and governments." They also have a repres tive at court in Philip.

The Mountbattenites interpret Charles' ing to school as a commoner as a great vi over the tyranny of tradition. They wan see the queen popularize the monarch much the same way as she handled the lenge of bringing up her son—by letting breath of change blow away some court webs.

The picture that palace officials try to p of the royal family is distasteful and potent dangerous, in the Mountbattenite view, cause it portrays the queen and those cl to her as puppets, not people.

Here is Charles, no paragon but a not ticularly talented, noisy nine-year-old. I is his sister, Anne, a tantrum child wi temper needs improving. Here is Elizabeth distantly regal figure but a shy young wo who is discovering how to be a happy qu though her old nervousness and tension show in telltale gestures as she chews her fiddles with a necklace, twitches at a g
"She loves to laugh," said one British rep after a close study, "she loves to tease, an wants gay, happy, frank young people ar her."

Philip would like to see her steer her r along a middle course between traditiona and the opposite extreme of Scandina where a king can casually ride a bus bicycle without comment from anyone.
moves to deglamorize their queen would totally unacceptable to the present Bri mood—and probably to Elizabeth he in her newly found enjoyment of people pageantry.

Because British ways are set and cha usually comes slowly, Queen Elizabeth's emancipation from the past may not be c pleted in her lifetime. But both husband wife want to make sure their son inherits h piness as well as a crown.

A few days before Cheam starts its sum holidays, the morning mail at Buckingh
Palace will bring another report card
Charles for his parents' inspection. By ev indication, his studies will still show "ro for improvement." But the queen proba won't mind that too much.

WE NEED YOUR HELP!

PLEASE . . . Include your city postal-zone number in your address when writing us about your present subscription, renewing your subscription,
ordering new subscriptions, questions concerning any of the Curtis magazines.

This will help us to handle your order or answer your question more quickly. If you have a postal-zone number, use it—always!

We have pledged to the Post Office Department that we will co-operate with them to help achieve the most economical and efficient means possible of delivering your magazines to you.

In order that we may co-operate with the Post Office Department in this endeavor we must include the zone number for each subscriber's address in zoned cities.

So, help yourself to better service by always using your zone number!

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY
INDEPENDENCE SQUARE
PHILADELPHIA 5, PENNSYLVANIA